

Strange Stories Of Spirits' Work.

Four Well-Attested Incidents That Point To Laws Far Beyond Our Present Ken.

J. H. C., in New York Sun.

In 1862 Tom Swift came over here from Ireland. He was a musician of extraordinary ability and was endowed with a genial, kindly disposition that won for him the affection of all who knew him well, but unfortunately he was dissipated, and in 1865 he brought him down to the gutter in Dublin, where he had been one of the leading teachers of music, and when he came to this country, he had the appearance of an old man. He had a large nose, a sunken eye, and a general appearance of one who had lived through many a hard day. His habit was too firmly rooted. He found many friends here, the principal one among them being a young man named Shelley, who had been a student of his in Dublin, and who had just finished a course of study at one of the leading universities of the United States. Mr. Shelley was in New York, and had just returned from a trip to Europe. He was a young man of about 20 years of age, and had a bright, intelligent face. He was a student of the law at one of the leading universities of the United States, and was highly respected by his fellow students and by the faculty. He was a young man of great ability and of high character, and was highly respected by all who knew him. Three months, as she was out for business, and doing rather well among the sailors, and some of the old men in the crew, who were passing the time in the harbor, under a pine tree, in a corner, starting at them and listening. From their conversation I gathered that two of my countrymen, who had been in the harbor, had been married against the will of their mothers—who had each other dearly—by a young man who had been in the harbor, and who had been married against the will of his mother. The young man, who had been in the harbor, had been married against the will of his mother. The young man, who had been in the harbor, had been married against the will of his mother.

Another Mr. nor Mrs. Wilson ever saw the decision of the garret, but Sam Barnes had two more experiences with him, and in one of them Mrs. Wilson participated in some degree. Sam was putting down a hall carpet on the second floor, near the foot of the garret stairs, and Mrs. Wilson stood near, with her back toward him, looking out of a window, when she suddenly experienced the sensation of a damp and very cold wind rushing by her. At the same instant Sam sprang up with a yell of "There he goes!" and dashed up the stairs to the garret. Having whipped the ghost once, he was not averse to trying conclusions with him again, but though he swore yet he saw the man pass between him and Mrs. Wilson and up the stairs as plainly as he ever saw any material object pass before him. He searched the garret for him in vain. On a subsequent occasion, when he was in the garret on his knees gathering up litter from the floor, Sam heard and felt something pass by his head, but an invisible something capable of effecting such a demonstration of force was more than he was disposed to encounter, and he fled.
