The programme was very interesting. James Shea gave a select reading of Abraham Lincoln's immortal Gettysburg speech. John Conway also read an address on "Civilization." Both efforts were well received by the large assembly. The readings showed careful conception of the meaning of the lines, and were instructive as well as entertaining. Charles Canavan declared "The Engineer's Bell" in a dramatic ma her. The chief event of the evening was a debate on "Resoived, That Statesmen Have Done More for Civilization Than Have Warriors." The negative side won by five points. The participants were: Affirmative, Timothy McCoy, Morgan Sweeney, William Vanning; negative, Frank McClane, P. Duffy and John Durkin, H. C. Gallagher presided.

His game did not work successfully, for among the very first successfully, for among the very first men that he struck was one who gave him over to Patrolman Peters, When he was brought up in police court yes-terday morning he did not by any means try to give out the impression that the goods were stolen, but on the contrary had a Penn avenue auctioneer at hand to testify that he bought the goods for good hard cash.

As in the green goods game, where the victim is as much of a sinner as the victimizer, it was thought by the police that no witnesses could be secured against Cavanaugh, so he was allowed to go with a warning to be out of the to go with a warning to be out of the city before noon. CRAND STAND LOVE STORY

Captain Asson Really a Star in Base Ball Drama.

NATIONAL GAME IS STAGED

'A Runaway Colt" Is the Only Play Founded on the Great American Sport-A Bishop Figures in the Ninth Inning.

Captain A. C. Anson, the noted base ball player, made his debut as a dramatic star in Syracuse last night in "A Runaway Colt," a play written for him and around him by Charles A. Hoyt. As he is the base ball hero of America, he becomes the consistent star of the only base ball play ever staged, and he has no minor part in the cast, but is on the stage in every scene from the rise of the curtain until he makes the home run hit in the last act which "rings down" the proper climax.

The scene of the first act is laid in The scene of the first act is laid in the home of Rev. Dr. Manners, near Racine, Wis, says the New York Herald. There Anson goes to visit the minister's son, Manly Manners, who is a famous young college pitcher, and whose services the Chicago captain wants to secure for his club. Manly's parents look upon Anson and all professional ball players as ruffians, and rather reluctantly consent to let Manly invite him to dinner on the day of his arrival. But Anson announces ly invite him to dinner on the day of his arrival. But Anson announces himself as Mr. Adrian, a friend of young Manners, and is received by the mother and by Mercy, the young collegian's sweetheart, who do not suspect that they are entertaining the awful, ruffianly Captain Anson. Both ladies do their best to entertain "Mr. Adrian," and the fun begins.

The subject of Manly's infatuation for base ball arises, and the "Old Man" is compelled to hear some "hot stuff" about his own supposed brutality. They tell "Mr. Adrian" that this awful man. Anson, is to dine with them that They tell "Mr. Adrian" that this awful man, Anson, is to dine with them that evening. Just then they get news that the bishop is also coming to dinner, and the two women almost faint. To think of their bishop meeting that boor, Anson, the ball player! They finally bag "Mr. Adrian" to make one of the dinner party just to help lighten the disgrace which the presence of Anson disgrace which the presence of Anson will be to the bishop-elect and "Mr.

Adrian's Knowledge of Base Ball. In this scene the heroine, Mercy, sud-denly asks: "Mr. Adrian, do you know anything about base ball?" And "Adrian" promptly replies: "Not a thing. The only people who do know all about it are the base ball reporters" do know an about it are the basis reporters."

Then the mother asks what his busi-ness is with Manly, and Anson, in order to maintain his incognito till Manly comes in, replies that he wants to em-ploy the son to travel at a salary of $2,400 a year. He describes the business:

"To travel more or less; to handle leather goods and in certain cities to deal with strikers."
"I suppose that would be out West?" suggests Mrs. Manly.
"In the West and South," says Anson. "There are no strikers in New York, are there?" inquires the mother.

Then Anson gives a body blow to the 895 Giants:

"There haven't been any this year in my business.

The mother goes out of the room and sends a servant in with a glass of wine for "Mr. Adrian." It is waved aside and the servant charged with the message: sage: "Thank her kindly, and ask her to pardon me for declining, as I don't indulge."

This line was written to emphasize Anson's well known abstinence from the use of all llquor.

At dinner Anson, as 'Mr. Adrian," meets the bishop, who in his college days had been a pitcher for a ball team, too. The bishop recognizes Anson and greets him warmly, being a great ad-greets him warmly, being a great ad-mirer of the Chicago captain. This commendation of Anson and his advo-cacy of base ball playing are so cordial that the Mannerses change their opin-ion of professionalism and let them-selves be persuaded by the bishop to consent to Manly's playing ball for the Chicagos. The second act is laid at the Ponce

The second act is laid at the Ponce de Leon hotel, at St. Augustine, Fla., where Anson has taken his colts for practice. The scene shows "the Pool" at that hotel. The Manners family are also guests, likewise the two villains, brothers named Haight, one of whom is conspiring to force Mercy to marry him. The other is a gambler, who plots to get Manly's younger brother, Dalton, into serious trouble, and in the third Old Maid After Anson. Old Maid After Anson.

In the party at the Ponce de Leon is an old maid who, ignorant that Anson is a married man, is following him around and plaguing him with her marks of affection. In one of his dilemmas Anson asks Manly to help him.

'Don't leave me alone with her," he says, "or I'll expel you—worse, I'll sell you to Louisville."

you to Louisville."

The third act shows the Chicago club gymnasium on visiting day. The scene presents a fully-equipped gymnasium, with horizontal bars, rowing machines, punching bags and other things. During the act specialty acts occur.

In this act the villains get the younger brother into their toils by inducing him to bet $2,000 which had been intrusted to him as a bank messenger, on the result of the Chicago-Baltimore game, which is to open the season, and, in which his brother, Manly, will pitch for the Chicagos. They feel pretty sure that whith the "the amateur" pitching against the champions the Chicagos will be defeated. Dalton will be in the toils, and to save him from prison Mercy will marry the chief plotter. But to make sure of it the gambling brother is induced to go into Anson's dressing room and bribe him. A great noise follows his entrance to Anson's private quarters, but when he emerges some moments later the terrible result of his efforts to bribe "the old man" is most marked.

The events of the last act take place marked.

The events of the last act take place The events of the last act take place in the upper tier of the grand stand of the Chicago base ball ground during the progress of the great Chicago-Baltimore base ball game. In the first part of the act the spectators are seen coming "up stairs" by means of a trap stairway from under the stage. There are Cullom, Dixwell. Fidler, Hopper, Della Fox. "Nat" Goodwin, and all the characters of the play. Harry Stevens, the celebrated score card man, greets them all in turn, and later on announces the progress of the game, while Dixwell them all in turn, and later on announces the progress of the game, while Dixwell and Cullom have a set-to at repartee.

Before the game begins Haight discloses his power over Dalton to Alercy and drives her to agree to marry him if the Chicagos lose the game. Then she sends for Anson, who knows all, and begs him to save her from Haight and Dalton from the penitentiary.

"You will win this game to-day, captain?" she pleads.

"I'll try to do that anyway," comes the reply, which is expected to bring down the house.

Adrian's Grand Binff.

Adrian's Grand Binff.

A little later he says: 'My dear little woman, base ball is mighty uncertain. But I'll play to-day as I never played before, and if I don't hit the ball, then the old man has lost his 'good eye.' Go in there, smile at your sweetheart, and don't lose hope till the last man is out."

The final scene shows the progress of the game and the effect it has on the different characters. The ninth inning is played complete. Every ball, strike and decision is heard by the unpire. Stavens announces every bill, error, or stole base. The realistic crack of the bat is a great triumph in stage device.

The game stands I to 0 against the Chicagos, with two out in the last half Adrian's Grand Bluff.

of the ninth inning. Dahlen is on base and Anson at bat. Two strikes and three balls have been called, McMahon pitching. Then comes the sound of ball and bat squarely meeting. Anson makes a home run hit over the fence and wins the game. Curtain.

During the excitement while Anson is at bat the bishop, who is one of the rooting spectators, is appealed to by Mercy's sister to "pray that the Chicagos will win. The response is philosophical rather than orthodox:

"My dear 'Babe,' it is too late to pray; make all the noise you can and rattle the pitcher."

The play was originally written for

The play was originally written for the Polo ground, but the scenes had to be changed to Chicago. That home run hit would have had to be made off Rusie, and Mr. Hoyt correctly concluded that such a climax would not set a New York audience wild. When the play goes to Cancago or Baltimorethen Rusie will be substituted for McMahon.

HENRY OPERA COMPANY. It Is Giving an Entertaining Performance

at Davis' Theater.

A dozen pretty girls, some of them clever in their lines with five male members as a side issue, compose the Henry Opera company, which performed at Davis' theater yesterday. The first part of the show is somewhat slow, but the general effect is pleasing. Gertie Le Clair sings several songs in an irresistable way. She is exceedingly chic and charming. Kittle Clements in a rope dance gives a graceul exhibition of endurance, and a winsome miss gave the original Trilby dance. Her costume bordered very close to the "altogether."

Rose Leslie and May Harding gave a realistic musical description of "I Don't Want to Play in Your Yard." Their dancing was very good. The men folks of the company fall short of amusing the audience. The show is a good one and is worthy a large attendance. The performance will be given this and tomorrow evenings with matinees. at Davis' Theater.

He Promptly Nails One of the Stories to the Convery.

The report has lately been circulated in the South Side that City Controller Widmayer had said that if C. W. Westpfahl became a candidate for the controllership he (Widmayer) would not aspire to a renomination.

"This report is grossly untrue." Said Mr. Widmayer last night: "Most certainly I am a candidate for renomination, and I never made any assertion to the contrary. From what I see and hear I believe I will win."
