Lackawanna Iron & Steel Company to Erect Ovens for Baking Iron Ores to Rid Them of Sulphur

Next week will be begun the construction of overs for baking the iron ore that the Lackawanna Iron and Steel company gets here from its ore beds at Lebanon. The Lackawanna iron and Steel comming gets here from its ore beds at Lebanon. The ovens will be located near the cinder dump adjoining the Erie and Wyoming Valley railroad tracks in the upper portion of the Twelfth ward. There will be a large force of men put to work excavating and many now idle will be given employment.

The company intends to build a half-dozen ovens right away for this nurpose; the ore by being baked is ridded of the sulphur that impregnates it and as it is necessary in the manufacture of first-class sicel that sulphur be eliminated from the ore. At present the baking is done at Lebanon, Henry Meticath, superintendent of the yard at the South works, has been ordered to bring his men around Monday morning to set them to work on the foundation of the ovens. The baking of iron ore is done on almost a similar principal to the way in which coke is made or limestone burned in the old-fashioned limekiln.

Mr. Simrell's Little Engine.

Permanent man Sterling Simrell, of the William Conneil Hose company, has put his mechanical genius to work and the result is a small engine that has sufficient horse power to run a sewing machine. The cylinder of it is not much larger than an ordinary threat spool, and the other parts are in proportion. The steam is generated in a small boiler which holds about a gallen of water and sets on the stove. The mach agry is a curlosity and well worth going to see. In this connection it might be added that the company's quarters under his care are a model of neatness and tidiness. The team of horses receive the best of care.
