

FROM WASHINGTON BY MAMLIN GARLAND

his inherited nature. His father had been a rather morose man, jealous of his rights, quick to quarrel, but just in his impulses. Arthur had inherited these stronger traits, but he had been covered up by the smiling exterior of youth.

Edith came up nearly every day with the major in order to enjoy the air and beauty of the sunshine, and when she did not come near enough to nod to Arthur he was a weary treadmill for the rest of the day, and the mountains became more stacks of gloomy debris.

"Oh, do you drive the horses?" she asked quickly. "Yes, for the present I am the plowman," he said, in the wish to let her know he was not a common hand.

After they had driven away Arthur finished his work in silence; he could hardly bring himself to speak to the horses, his mind was in such a tumult. He went up to his little room and sat down, facing the glorious mountains, and he sat there until the enraging gloom of rising night climbed to the glittering crowns of those towering 3,000 feet above the twinkling lights of the city.

He was naturally keen, sensitive and impressionable; his white, sensitive face, for he had read a great deal and held his reading at command. All this thought concerned itself first of all with the attitude these people assumed toward him. It was perfectly evident that they regarded him as a creature of inferior sort.

"Oh, I didn't mean base ball, I mean foot ball." "We don't play that much in the west. We go in more for base ball; more science."

"Oh, I like foot ball best, it's so lively. I like to see them when they get all bunched up, they look so funny, and then when some fellow gets the ball under his arms, and goes scooting around with the rest all jumping at him."

"Well, Edith are you ready?" asked the major, coming up. Arthur sprang up as if he suddenly remembered that he was a workman.

"Well, we'll be going in a minute, Mr. Ramsey, do you think that millet has got water enough?"

"Oh, Do You Drive the Horses?" She asked, thoughtfully. "Yes, for the present I am the plowman," he said, in the wish to let her know he was not a common hand.

the wind stirs his hair. Riding thus, exalted thus, one might be shaped a desperate resolution; he determined to do just as he pleased, and at that moment with whom he was on the same intimacy of footing.

It was as good as any class, he was not a good one, for he lacked her sweetness and purity of heart, and because she lived in a great house and wore beautiful garments, did not shut him off from calling upon her.

But week after week went by without his daring to make his resolution good. He determined many times to ask permission to call, but somehow he never did.

He seemed to see her rather less than at first, and her presence there was a charge. She seemed to have lost her first eager and frank curiosity about him, and did not always smile now whenever he came.

Then, again, he could not, in working dress as he called, it would seem so incongruous to stand before her to make such a request as that of the permission and cast. It was hard to be dignified under such circumstances; he must be washed and dressed properly.

Some times she sat on the porch with the children while Mrs. Richards, the foreman's wife, a hearty, talkative woman, plied her with milk and cookies.

"It must be heaven to live here and feed the chickens and cows," the young girl said one day when Arthur was passing by—quite accidentally.

Mrs. Richards took a seat, wiping her face on her apron. "Wal, I don't know about that, when it comes to waiting."

"These two men had drifted to the farm from the mines somewhere, and were rough, hard characters. They would have liked to blow with him, only they knew something of the power lying coiled in his long arms."

One day he overheard one of the men speaking to Edith, and his tone stopped the blood in Arthur's heart. When he walked among the group of men, his face was white and set.

Why There Can Be No War. From the Chicago Times-Herald. Great Britain will not engage the United States in a war for two sufficient reasons. First, because she is dependent on foreign soil for more than half her food supplies.

It has been suggested that both food and raw cotton might escape the perils of such a war by being carried in neutral ships. This expedient England herself knows well would be worthless.

When, last year, the question of strengthening the British navy was up before parliament, the country, the London Times said: "Our own maritime commerce is our life blood. To arrest its flow means ruin to the nation."

But could she get cotton? It has been intimated that she is not seriously dependent now upon the United States for her chief raw cotton import. Here, however, are the figures.

Percentage of imports of raw cotton from the United States into the United Kingdom—1881..... 65.19; 1882..... 65.48; 1883..... 65.73; 1884..... 72.41; 1885..... 71.91.

WALL STREET REVIEW

New York, Jan. 15.—The great topic of discussion in financial circles today was the dissolution of the syndicate. The dissolution of the syndicate would have had an important bearing on the market for securities had it not been for the manner in which the head of the combination of bankers and capitalists handled the matter.
