Story of the Advance from Tallow to Electricity—How the Candle Snuffer Became an Electrician in Four Decades.

In the days of the Elizabethan theater the performances took place in the open and began at 3 p. m.. so the artificial light was rarely required. Sunset and sunrise, moonlight and starlight, high noon and midnight existed only in the vivid imagination of the spectators, who must, in those days, have found much education, for their fancy and inspiration for their sympathies in the state of the spectators of the spectators. In the days of the Elizabethan theater the performances took place in the open and began at 3 p. m., so the artificial light was rarely required. Sunset and sunrise, moonlight and starlight, high noon and midnight existed only in the vivid imagination of the spectators, who must, in those days, have found much education, for their fancy and inspiration for their sympathies in theater-going, which patrons of today are relieved of by the eleverness of stage managers and electricians and painters, says the Boston Herald. The first artificial light upon the stage was furnished by two large branches of lights, one on either side of the stage. These branches of light obstructed the view of the auditors and they were finally replaced by small circular wooden frames, fitted with candles. These hoops of light were suspended from the proscenium and there were no footlights between were suspended from the proscenum and there were no footlights between the actors and the orchestra. There were usually eight hoops of candles, four on either side of the stage, and these were of wax or tallow, according to the manager's purse. The body of the house was lighted by "cressets or the house was lighted by "cressets or large open lanthorns, nearly as large as those in the poop of a ship." An amusing incident in which one of these hoops of candles is employed is related by Richard Jenkins, in his "Memoirs of the Bristol Stage." One Winston, a mocic actor, who would play tragedy at times, was doing "Richard III.." when, in flourishing his sword in calling for "a horse. a horse." he accidentally cut the rope that held up the lliuminating arch, and, as he dodged, it descended fairly and squarely around his neck, to his great discomfort and the great delight of the audience. Theater-goers in light of the audience. Theater-goers in those days were not a jot different from theater-goers of today, and an accident was, then as now, always productive of a peal of uproarious laughter. Still, it must have been funny to see Catesby struggling to relieve his monarch of that embarrassing position before the little affair at Tewkesbury could be set

One of the first managers to use foot lights was Garrick, who introduced various improvements into Drury Lane, London, armong them, in 1756, a row of footlights. Candles were used for that purpose, but were soon replaced by oil, footlights being then known as "the foot!" and completely of one long tank footlights being then known as "the float," and consisting of one long tank of oil with a series of wicks. With the disappearance of the oil lamp, which served to illuminate the theater far into the nineteenth century, disappeared also from the playhouse a character who up to then was an institution—the "candle snuffer," or, as he was called in Paris, le moucheur de chandeller. This party's duty was to watch the lights and walk right on to the stage at any time during the performance, to snuff the candles as they needed it. In due course of evolution the "candle snuffer" became the tender of lamps, then the gas man, and finally the electrician. In his hour, the candle-snuffer was a favorite butt for the humor of the audience. He was pelted if fancy was a favorite butt for the numor of the audience. He was pelted if fancy seized it; he was guyed and scoffed at. That humor of the audience exists to-day, although the modern method of etting and resetting the stage and changing the scenes has largely re-moved the opportunity. We all re-member the days when stages had deep aprons and the queer looking men and boys always came in front to take up or put down the carpets between the acts, or to sweep up torn paper or a snowstorm with which a previous act had littered the stage; or in the days before dark changes, how the same man brought on or carried off chairs and tables to the delight of the small boy in the gallery or the big one down stairs.

It is a little uncertain just when gas was first introduced into the theater. It first came out in London, some time during 1818 when M. de la Forte was sent from Paris to London to investi-gate the effects of the use of hydrogen gas, as applied to lighting the stage. His report was so favorable that after some experiments, on February 26, 1822, gas was successfully introduced in the gas was successfully introduced in the opera house. Paris. By a curious coincidence, the first opera lighted by it was "Aladdin." a new and posthumous work by Nicolo. This example was quickly followed by all of the other Paris theatres. Today the work of lighting the theater is a work of art as well as mechanical ingenuity, and, while the great master of that effect has gained much in America in the way of aids to carry on his ideas. Henry Irving has been studied, but hardly emulated, by American managers, many of whom still secure brilliant effects without reason and startling results that out reason and startling results that scorn nature. Today, electricity is used in nearly all theaters, and footused in nearly all theaters, and foot-lights are supplemented with side lights, meant to do away, if possible, with lime lights. The border lights which were introduced to give to the scene a natural glow by coming from the right direction, have today, from one line across the top of the proscen-ium arch, increased to six, so that the light can be directed on any part of the scene, or shed completely over it. The modern lighting is so complicated that the switchboard, with its dozen regulators, capable of doing marvels in the way of lighting, is the most expen-sive, elaborate and interesting feature of the world behind the scenes. The of the world behind the scenes. The candle snuffer of the sixteenth century has become the electrician of the nine-teenth, and the end is not yet. BENEFACTOR OF HIS SPECIES.

In Turkestan, on the right bank of the Amou Diara, in a chain of rocky hills, near the Bokharan town of Karki, are a near the Bokharan town of Karki, are a number of large caves which, upon examination, were found to lead to an underground city, built apparently long before the Christian era. According to effigies, inscriptions and designs upon the gold and silver money unearthed from among the ruins the existence of the town dates back some two centuries before the birth of Christ.

The underground Bokharan city is before the birth of Christ.

The underground Bokharan city is about two versts long, and is composed of an enormous labryinth of corridors, streets and squares, surrounded by house and other buildings two or three stories high. The edifices contain all kinds of domestic utensils, pots, urns, vases, and so forth. In some of the streets fall of earth and rock have obstructed the passages, but generally the visitor can walk about freely without lowering his head. The high degree of civilization attained by the inhabitants of the city is shown by the fact that they built in several stories, by the symmetry of the streets and square, and by the beauty of the clay and metal utensils, and of the ornaments and coins.
