The ANDREWS' LEGACY

BY JOHN LANGDON HEATON.

[Copyright, 1896, by the Bacheller Syndicate.]

SYNOPSIS.

Janet Andrews, the young widow of Eliphalet Andrews, a ten-millionaire of New York, is anxious to devote his fortune, which has been left to her, to good works. She consults her lawyer, Hosmer, a bachelor of 40, and together they discuss many plans for charitable enriowment, none of which proves satisfactory. Mrs. Andrews goes among the slums with Hosmer and a newspatter friend, Ford. The visit brings no light, Ford suggests starting a model newspater, and Mrs. Andrews favors the idea. SYNOPSIS.

PART II.

CHAPTER IV. After the burst of applause that marked the conclusion of the address of Greener, the celebrated socialist, before the Twenty-first Century club, the evening after the slumming party, word was brought to him that a lady in the audience desired some practical advice. And presently he was bowing low before Janet Andrews.

lon before Janet Andrews.
"I was much interested by your talk,
Mr. Greener," she began, "and would like to lay a specific case before you, in confidence, for advice,"
"You may rely upon my respecting the confidence," said Greener, who took life seriously and was rather ponderous in speech.

"I have a friend," said Janet, "who wishes to bequeath her fortune to some practical work. But she finds it diffienit to select it. Could you advise "Your friend," said Greener, with meaning emphasis, "is quite like others. She wishes to enjoy, throughout a life which may be long, that which is not hers, and afterwards to fling some portion of it into the gulf of misery. that paupers may scramble for it. Your friend might aid the Cause. But of course she will not do that. In any case. I could not advise any of those mischievous forms of activity known as charity. If she does not wish to In regenerative work, she would do much better to keep her money and buy pearls and pug dogs. Better that, had as it is, than seek to make a class and then ruin it."

"I might have known I'd get nothing "I might have known I a get nothing practical from him," thought Janet, as she turned away, her cheeks flushing at the rebuff she had received, "but I'm getting desperate enough for any-

And this must, indeed, have been the case, else she would never have called upon Aunt Fanny Duyckinck, as she did the very next evening, to inspect the doings of her Working Girls' club, in hope of an idea. People who knew Mrs. Ducykinck well seldem looked upon her as an example of practical Janet was surprised when Aunt Fanny welcomed her in evening dress. The host is explained that she was so busy that really she couldn't devote her entire evenings to the club during the "season." "Come," she concluded, "let's ge down to them. I haven't seen them yet this evening myself."

She led the way down the basement stairs. In the servants' hall they found half a dozen young women. A French maid in a dainty cap was with them and books were strewn about the table. and books were stream about the table.

There was a little chorus of "Ohs!"
and "Ahs!" as the two entered the room, and one girl chapped her hands. Mrs.
Ducyinck blushed and looked pleased.

"Mais, madame, vous etes charmante, tres charmante! Volla une costume N'est ce pas, mesdemoismagnifique! cried the maid, turning to the girls at the table.

One or two responded: "Mais out, m'amseile Nanette," in apparent pride of their linguistic skill. The others were discreetly silent.

"Yes, isn't it pretty, girls?" cried Ducyknick, turning slowly round to exhibit her finery, "They're having a exhibit her finery. "They're having a French lesson," she explained to Mrs. Andrews. "Nanette teaches them. Oh, we do lots of things. I read to them, and discuss the topics of the day, and tell them what books are lit to read and which ones young girls should leave alone. We'll have more members by and by."

All this was said with extreme volubility, and in full hearing of the club. Janet looked at the young women. All were well dressed and seemed intelligent. One or two appeared as if they might be sufficiently desirous of learning French to overlook such eccentricities in their hostess, but at least a por-tion of the group, she was certain, were having a little quiet sport at a silly woman's expense. She was about to take her leave when a boy of nine burst into the room. He was in his stockings, his coat was off, his waist unbut-toned, his tie was dragging over his shoulder, and he was panting as if he

"Nurse says you're going out." he shouted in his childish treble "You're always going out. Won't you give me some money? I'll have to go to school before you are up, and I want—" "Yes, yes, dear; you shall have it," said Aunt Fanny, hastily, "How careless to let you come down in such a shocking state! But no matter." Then turning, she continued in a chirruping. cheerful voice: "These are mamma's working girls, Horace. Please say 'How do you do?' to mamma's working prospect of immediate funds rendered Master Horace good-natured, and he graciously shook hands with each girl in turn. The contrast behis unconventional attire and mien of dignity was so comic that one working girl concealed her face behind handkerchief and three giggled, and Mrs. Andrews, struggling with an almost overmastering impulse to follow suit, escaped downstairs.

CHAPTER V. ROSES RED.

Janet Andrews was indeed becoming desperate. People had somehow heard of her benevolent purpose and her un-made will, and her doorbell had little rest from morning till night.

Always hoping against hope that a feasible idea might be suggested by some of these visitors—every one of whom wanted immediate cash is possible, a legacy if that was the best possione, a legacy it that was the best that could be had—she was listening one afternoon to a dreary succession of appeals for money from rich people pleading general needs and poor ones pleading personal wants, and all equally barren of suggestion in her dilemna. and she had given checks with a lib-erality which she knew was reckless, and feared might be mischievous, when Aunt Fanny Duyckinck was announced and burst in upon her with the "Have you seen the papers?"

'No: what papers?" The Sunday papers, of course; yesterday's. I didn't, either, till an hour ago. I heard about it and sent down town after them. The horrid crea-

"No, but they binted at it."
"I am very sorry," said Mrs. Andrews, "for I am afraid it will put a stop to your charities,"
"No, it won't. But that club will stop! I couldn't hear to have the creatures in the bouse again. You never can know when they are going to turn again and rend you. What the lower classes really need is more delicacy. Now, I'm going to get a big basket of roses-you can get very fair ones for eight dollars a dozen-and I'm going to stores and shops and places where such girls are, and give 'em away. Fill be sure they aren't reporters then, any-how. And if I see any destitution among the people I can ofter assist-

"All right," said Ransom, "so much the better for you. Now for the interview, if you please." The interview, an "exclusive" for the Trumpet, was well over when Mrs. Duyckinck came bustling in.
"How are the roses going," asked Janet, weakly, reclining in a big chair after her labors, and feeling as if the world was nearing its end. Roses! Humph! I actually did buy a basketful of beauties and went down among the shops, and looked around until I saw a really elever looking Hosmer and Janet are both absurd-ly happy. He has discovered that a man can spend twenty years in engross-ing labor and still be at feet ing labor and still be, at forty, young in heart. She has found that a mo-tive in life was what she wanted. They are to be married soon, and will take a long trip abroad before settling down to their life work.

AMUSEMENTS.

Black Path, the greatest sloger of her race, who has won triumbhs in every part of the civilized world, comes to the Frothingham tonight for a half week's engagement in conjunction with the "Black Pattl's Troubadours," which is said to be the most imposing organ-ization of colored performers in exist-ence. There are fifty people in the company which is credited with giving a performance that excels in point of novelly anything that has been seen or the American stage. While comedy and vandeville hold a conspicuous place on the programme yet the great feature of the performance is the operatic Kaleidoscope which occupies the final half hour. In this are introduced the happiest selections taken from "Grand Duchess," "Trovatore," "Carmen," "Daughter of the Revolution." "Faust," "Tar and Tartar," "Bohem-lan Girl," "Maritana," "Luccia," and "Rigoletto."

The announcement of the coming of Hoyt's "A Texas Steer," to the Froth-ingham Thursday (Thanksgiving) for matinee and evening performance will be welcomed with a feeling of delight by the entire comedy loving population of our city. While "A Texas Steer" may not be consistantly reckoned with a standard novel, its application to contemporary events is still so clearly apparent that its popularity is not to be a source of wonderment. The com-edy is a satire from beginning to end. The company is promised as one of the best that has been sent out in this most laughable satire.

As a Thanksgiving Day attraction for the Academy of Music Manager Long has secured "A Romance of Coon Hollow," which will be produced af-ternoon and evening. Here, mirrored pature in beauty and quaintness given a picture of real life in old Among the scenes will be Tennessee. Among the scenes will be that of a cotton press in operation as seen, on the southern plantation, a moonlight picture of Coon Hollow with electric, calcium and lime light ef-fects, and the great boat race be-tween the Mississippi river steamers lights. F. Lee and Natches. Rober, E. Lee and Natchez.

An entertainment that should please everybody will be on at Davis' the-ater all this week. It is a mixed show, embracing comedy, vaudeville and pantomine, served up in such proportions and combinations as to merit and win the approbation of Manager Davis' entire patronage. A half hour of legitimate comedy will be followed by a number of top-liner specialties, the show concluding with a lively pantomine, in which the entire company will appear. The complete show, combere all day long.'
"Thank you,' she said, 'but I cannot accept them. It would take nearwill appear. The complete show, comedy, vaudeville acts and pantomine, will be changed after Wednesday; so not accept them. It would take near-ly half my week's wages to buy such roses," will be changed after Wednesday; so one can see, virtually, two complete shows during the week. The very best talent has been engaged, and a splen-did entertainment is assured.
