In the summer of 1706, two years after the second battle of Hochsetett. after the second battle of Hochseteck, which Englishmen call Blenheim, in a world ringing with the names of Marl-borough and Eugene, Louis of Baden and Villars, Viteroy the Incapable and Bouffles the Braye—a world, for us, of dark chaos luridly lit by flames of burning hamlets, and galoned through huge troopers wearing periwigs and high boots, and pistols two feet long in the barrel—one of the Austrian cap-tains sat down before the frontier town

Whereat Huymonde was not too greatly moved. hid a portion of each under the cellar hid a portion of each under the cenar-floor; thanked God that they were not the garrison and that times were changed since the Thirty Years' War; and, in short, fell very easily into an idle life flecked with bubbles of excitement. When the Austrian guns rum-bled without, and the smoke eddied slowly over the walls, they stood in the slowly over the walls, they stood in the seventeenth centuries was dying or streets, their hands in their muffs, and gossiped not unpleasantly; when the cannons were silent, they smoked their to it. Whether thee had less faith in the great Louis-who, indeed, seemed in these days less superior to a world in arms than in the dawn of his glory —or whether they found the oldest ina arms than in the dawn or ms grown more highly appreciated, than on the constraint's tales too precisely to the day of his arrival.

The ordeal had been more severe than usual; his cheek still twitched, and he leaned against his of-ficial table to belie his trembling knees. ficial table to belie his trembling knees. He had been settling a change of billets, when the viragos broke in on him, and only his cierk had been present; for his council—and this rub he felt sorely—much bullied in old days, were treating him to solitude now and the monopoly of the burden. His clerk was still with him, but affected to be busy with the papers on the table—perhaps with the papers on the table-perhaps he was scared, too, and equally bent on hiding it; so it was the burgomaster himself who first discovered that they were not in fact alone but that one woman still lingered. She sat in a corner of the oak seat that ran round the paneled room; and the stained glass of the windows, blazoned with the arms of Huymonde and the Count of Flanders, cast a veil of tawny lights between her and the gazer, a vell behind which she seemed to lurk. The Burgomaster started, then remembered that the danger was over for the time. and in a harsh voice bade her fellow her mates.

"Begone, wench," he said. "And go to your prayers! That is women's work. Leave these things to men." The woman rose, "When men," she answered, in a strident voice at which the Burgomaster started afresh, "hide themselves, it is time women stood for-ward. Where is your son?'

The Burgomaster swore. "Where is your son?" the woman repeated firmly.

The Burgomaster swore again, his sallow face grown purple; then looked at his clerk and signed to him to go. The clerk went wondering and gaping -for this was unusual-and left the two together.

Then the Burgomaster found his voice. "You Jezebel!" he cried, passionately, approaching the woman. "How dare you come here to make mis-chief? How dare you lay your tongue to my son's name? Do you know, shameless one, that if I were to—" But at that the woman caught fire, blazed up and fairly outdid him in rage. She was middle-ared and stare. blazed up and fairly outdid him in rage. She was middle-aged and spare, with a face naturally pale and refined, and an air of pride that peered even through the neat poverty of her dress. But at that word she shook her hands in his face, and her eyes blazed "Shameless?" she retorted. "No, but shameful, and through whom? Through your son, you villain, your craven of a son, who hides now! Through your bree-born tradesman of a son who dare the Burgomaster answered, She dung up her hands. "Then be-ware!" she cried, wildly, and for the first time raised her voice. "Beware! You and yours have brought us shame, but the end is not yet. The end is not yet. You do not know us." At that, however, he railled himself, reliable, sure.

"I may not know you yet." he said, hardly, and, indeed, brutally, "but I know this, That such things as these come, woman, of people setting them-selves up to be better than their neighbors—when they are as noor as caurch mice! "Not while I live," he answered,
"Not while I live," he answered, firmly

"And that is your last word?"
"It is," he said.

"It is," he said.

He was on his guard, prepared to defend himself against her violence. But after a tense pause of suspense, during every moment of which he expected ner to fall upon him, she said only: 'Where is he?" "I shall not tell you," he answered.

"And that is all?"
"That is all."
It was not their first interview. She had plead with him before, had knelt and wept and abased herself before him, had done all that the love that tore her heartstrips; the love that made it. her heartstrings, the love that made it so much more difficult to see her child suffer than to suffer herself, the love that every moment painted the bare room at home and her daughter pres-trate there in shame and despair—she and done all that even that love -ould suggest. There was no room here for further pleading; and she had threat-ened and failed. What then remained to be done? Nothing, the Burgomaster thought, as in a flush of triumph and relief he watched her go, outfaced and defeated. Nothing; and he hugged himself on the prudence that had dispatched his son out of the way in time, and rendered a match with that proud pauper brat im-possible. Nothing; but to the woman, is she went, it seemed that everything. everything, was yet to be done. As she left the little square and plunged into the narrow street that led to her House on the Wall, the story of her life in Huymonde spread itself before her in a string of scenes that now—now alas, but never before—seemed to find their natural sequence in this tragedy. Nine years before she had come to Huymonde with her artist husband; but the great art of the sixteenth and pottery; but on old conventional lines, in endless repetition of old formal patterns, with no touch of genius or appreciation. Trade, and a desire to win the florid case, the sleek comfort, of the the winter siege of '41.
