It Took Pince at Hagerstown and Almost Led to a Tragedy. From the Philadelphia Times.

The army of northern Virginia wa retreating from Gettysburg. It halted near Hagerstown and threw up in-trenchments as if anticipating another engagement. But no engagement was expected or desired. The south was defended and General Lee knew it. The soldiers straggled into town in search of amusement and to supplement their rations. They found whisky in abundance—a luxury not easily obtained in the confederacy. They had it, and partook of it freely. In consequence they were noisy and by no means a pleasant acquisition to the good people of Hagerstown. Rumors of their disorderly demeanor reached General Lee, who immediately sent a percentage who immediately sent a percentage of the disorder that all confederates—men and officers—should return to camp at once. of amusement and to supplement their ficers—should return to camp at one.

I was provost marshal of Hagerstown at the time, and the order came to me. I detailed a squad of men under a sergeant and sent them out with ingructions to enforce it. They returned in a short time and reported that all had the control of of the cavalry. He was in a store, and drinking, and refused to go. I knew high. He was a fine man and gallant officer, and fearless as the proverbial lion. He was also six feet and seven tackers in better and of propartionate inches in height, and of proportionate dimensions in other respects. "Show me Colonel F—" I said, "and I will see that he obeys." The men led the way. Sure enough, we found Colonel F— leaning on the counter of a store; he had evidently been drinking, though not intoxicated.

"Colonel," said I, walking up to hin "Colonel," said I, walking up to him,
"I have an order from General Lee to send all Confederates—men and officers—to camp at once. You will please obey."

Looking at me coolly, in spite of his heated condition, he said, "I will not

But, Colonel," I said, "you must go." "I will not go," he replied, "I don't belong to your command. I belong to Roony Lee's division."
"But, Colonel," I said, "the order is from General Rober E. Lee and Roony Lee himself is under his command. The order makes no exception, and leaves me no option but to see it My dear Mrs. Pinkham:—

"If you order those men to fire on me I will sheet you."

"If you order those men to fire on me I will shoot you."

I did not reply, but studied my time-piece intently. What should I do?"

What ought I to do? I did not wish to sacrifice this gallant life. A passing thought that my own life hung on a thread flitted through my mind. It was only a flitting thought. Veterans are so inured to danger that it makes but little impression when they have it to face. To this fact, I think, is due their efficiency more than to the superior training experience gives. They are never hindered in appreciating a situation or obeying an order by per situation or obeying an order by per sonal fear. "Very well, do so," said I, greatly relieved to have the responsibility re-moved. I left him to the adjutant. What argument he used I do not know but in a few minutes he had persuaded him to return to his command, and Colonel F— never knew of the mental conflict I had undergone.

Grant's Lesson to a Sentinel.

General Horace Porter, in his "Cam paiging with Grant" in the December Century, relates an anecdote telling how General Grant aided a drover in turning his cattle, General Porter adds: He knew, of course, that the man did not recognize him. If he had supposed the man was lacking in proper mili-tary respect, he would perhaps have administerd to him the same lesson which he once taught a soldier in the Twenty-first Illinois, when he commanded that regiment. An officer who served under him at he time told me that Colonel Grant, as he came out of his tent one morning, he found a strap-ping big fellow posted as sentinel, who nodded his head good-naturedly smiled blandly, and said "Howdy, col onel?" His commander cried, "Hand me your piece," and upon taking it, faced the soldier and came to a "pre-sent arms;" then handed back the musket, he remarked, "That is the way to say 'How do you do' to your col
