Con le Rol, the highwayman, otherwise bows, now it as the Little Red Man, was famous "Cie exploits at Paris, in the time of V. He hopes to obtain sympathy and assistance from her, for she is familiar with the goings on of all the thieves and yagabonds in Paris.

PART III.

"I read your thoughts, my dear friend," said she. They would make a dull book, mad-

The lieutenant laughed savagely. "I would like to learn where the man is at this moment," exclaimed he. "Is that all-surely, nothing could be more simple. I will summon Antonio." "Oh! it is Antonio who is the friend of assassins, then?" "Certainly, he is a brother to them all. Does that shock you, dear M. de

"It is a child's task, mademoiselle." Sartines, who had begun by treating the whole thing as an elaborate jest, listened to this talk incredulously. While he told himself that Antonio's claim was absurd, preposterous, ridieulous, nevertheless the idea that he should put the physician to the trial was strong and fascinating. He felt like one in the presence of a conjuror. He would watch the trick closely perhaps learn something from it. Besides, if he should get any informa-tion about Coq le Roi-but that, he said, was impossible Antonio, meanwhile, had crossed the great room and had seated himself before a little table upon which was an astrolabe in brass, a lamp with a green shade and a large sheet of drawing paper all scattered over with hieroshade and a large sheet of drawing paper all scattered over with hieroglyphics and strange lettering, like the lettering of an eastern manuscript. When he had turned back the long sleeves of his gown and had taken a pair of compasses in his hand the doctor bade the others come near.

"Monsieur," said he to Sartines, "you desire to know in what occupation the man Jacques Cabot, sometimes called Coq le Roi, has been employed during the last twelve hours. If you will be good enough to sit by my side and to say nothing until the clock shall strike again I will tell you."

The lieutenant, assuring himself that he was a fool to take part in such mlummery, sat as the physician directed. Corinne took her stand beside him. Antonio, resting his head upon his hands, cried suddenly for less light; and, at the words, lacqueys entered the room noiselessly and extinguished the candles. Only the shaded green lamp remained, and from its aureole the figure of the old doctor stood out, motionless, stern—the figure of some weird magician risen up from the ages of the past.

Five minutes passed, and nothing was to be heard in the great room but the stellar of the clock Sartines.

Five minutes passed, and nothing was to be heard in the great room but the ticking of the clock. Sartines found himself spellbound; Corinne herself stood like a statue, scarce seeming to breathe. When, at last, Antonio broke the spell, he did so by beginning to speak in a low voice, accompanying the words with the tracing of strange lines upon the paper before him.

"Monsieur," said he, addressing Sartines, but, keeping his eyes upon the paper, "at 12 o'clock today Coq le Roi was at Soisy, robbing the coach of his lordship, the duke of Sabran."

"Dieu!" cried Sartines, rising from his chair; "you say—"

Antonio, without so much as turning his head, continued to draw upon the paper. Corinne touched the lifetenant gently upon the arm and made a sign to him that he should say nothing.

"At 3 o'clock," continued the physisician, whose voice was now strong and clear as the note of a bell, "I find that Coq le Roi was at Gros Brois, after a stopping the coach of the grand master of artilliery, Comte d'Eu, and robbing him of three hundred louis d'or."

"Sang-bleu!" cried Sartines, while he threw hemself back in his chair and hunghed heartily, "what a play. Oh, Sartines? If so, we will not trouble him of three hundred louis d'or."

lieutenant became impatient.

"Well," he said, "are you not going to exhibit the godfather of assassins?

It was as she said. The old doctor. Antonio, had entered the room during their talk; and the lieutenant felt a cold chill run down his spine, when suddenly he became aware that a strange figure stood at his side. Whence the apparition had come; from the shelter of what trap or panel or hiding place, Sartines could not tell. He knew only that the old man was before him, clad in his Geneva gown, and wearing a full-buttoned wig, the at his outburst, and now pale with

It is a matter of commonest experience it is a matter of commonest experience that the higher the moral quality of any emotion, sentiment, or theory of life, the more dangerous the busk of it is likely to prove when emptied of ethical content. There is a distinct tendency in some quarters today to treat everything as gorious which the flag can be made to cover, and to denounce as unparioute all critical inquiry into the real ethical concilers of national life. An Effective Call.

A traveling man, who put up for the night at the leading hotel in a small town, had before retiring, left explicit instructions to be called for an early train. He was very earnest about the matter, and threatened the clerk with all manner of punishment if that duty was neglected. Early in the morning the guest was disturbed by a lively tation upon the door. "Well?" he demanded sleepilly. "I've got an important message for you," replied the bell boy. The guest was up in an instant, opened the door and received from the hoy a large envelope. He tore open the envelope hastily, and inside found a slip of paper on which was written in large letters: "Why don't you get up?" He got up.
