It was two years and one month now, since he had begun to build his new-fangied house near the village. What induced him to do it he knew not. He had never been one of those that are troubled with ideas; never been tempted to start up and do things; was always content to plod along the safe way of his forefathers. But other men were building. They talked large at the village inn over their beer. Times were changing, they said. Some even prophesied that, before many years, the shrick of the steam engine would be heard in those quiet meadows. It was like a fever that talk at the Waldhorn. men, they said, should come forward, when land was going up like pancakes, and show themselves enterprising and public-spirited, not stick in their shells like snails. Projects, ad figures and probabilities were paraded until his head swam.

He used to go home across the field and try to explain what he had heard to Christel. He remarked, better than yesterday, the first time he broached the subject. He came into the kitchen and took off his boots, and she fetched him his carpet-slippers and skull-capall still and friendly as was her way. After they had their usual supper of good boiled potatoes and thick, sour milk, which they always ate in silence -for it was best to give your mind to your meals-and after she handed him his long pipe and tobacco pouch, and he had puffed awhile, he began to talk, and not before; for when he had anything to say he liked to sit down quiet ly and get ready, and not feel hurried.

So he sat in his chair and smoked, and poke between his whifts, while Christel sat in hers and knitted and said nothing. But, somehow, in the still cottage, away from the men's encouragement, things sounded altogether different. At any rate, he could not rouse her to any sense of their importance, or make her understand. She listened quite unconcerned, and clicked on busily, asking no questions and making no comments. But when nine o'clock came, and she got up to lay aside her spectacles and knitting, and look after fire and lights, she said in her quiet way-she was always a quiet woman, his wife Christel-she thought she and her good old Jokeb would be apt to sleep well and long on it before they took up outlandish notions. And, somehow, it secretly irritated him that she felt so secure, and every day at the Waldhorn the men's talk pulled him the other

It was long before she seemed able to grasp the fact that he was in earnest, and no wonder, for never before length perceived his mind was made at their age, so near the grave, build houses? The more she pleaded, the more stubborn he became, as if in his old age suddenly possessed of a devil. He might have remembered Christel was always right. Never a woman of many and discharged him promptly. No words, but what she said rang true. He buried her on the ninth of November, seventeen months gone. She had drooped from the time he began building, she took it so to heart. That is what the new house cost him.

There it stood empty and useless. No one would buy it. He hated it. Day and night he missed his Christel and brooded over his misfortune. The new house was his curse. Had he not built it, he would not have lost his health, his money, his home, his farm, his peace of mind and his good old wife. Over the very thought of it they two fell out for the first time in their lives. She kept her word; never looked at it building; never saw it done; it was hardly finished when she died. Had he listened to her, all would still be well Thus he brooded continually, and a dull, impotent rage possessed him more and more, a sense of personal enmity toward the house which neither he nor anybody else wanted, and which had robbed him of his Christel, the blessing of all his days.

One evening, the previous November, he was returning from a neighboring market town with some of the villagers. He had done little enough business, merely a few small matters which he had they two divided opinions upon had undertaken for the young couple in any course whatever. When she at his cottage, and once he was one of the most important and respected men on up, she opposed most bitterly. Why, the market. Such reflections galled him. It was hard, in one's old age, to lose the fruits of all the patient labor their hard-earned savings in building, of one's life, as well as the conscious-

So he was taciturn, and came along with the others, mostly young men merely from habit, and because they were all from Sonnenheim; and sat with them in the Drei Mohren and the Schwalbe and the Traube, and the other inns where they stopped for beer or cider or new wine, yet drank nothing himself, except one glass of the new -young Thomas Bolz, who was a bit nerry, insisting upon it-and hardly heard their boasts and laughter, so lost was he in his own dreariness.

Finally, however, on the road home ward, their loud wit turned upon him. Bolz, chaffing him noisily about what people now called "Bleibtreu's Folly," asked him if he was going to hang lac curtains in the windows and have a doorbell like city folks, perhaps-who knew? a piano, or even a smart young wife; such things had happened before now to sly old men; and joked on. Remnants of not unkindly; but after the jovial fashon of young men who have partaken at brief intervals of beer, cider and new vine. Yet, as they parted at the stilefor Bleibtreu's way lay over the fields. the others down the high road to the village-young Bolz was not too merry to notice how wearily the old man walked, and to turn and accompany him a bit across the fields, holding his arm: and this was not much after ten o'clock, as all of them could and did testify. Toward five o'clock on the following morning, Bleibtreu, sleeping soundly, was waked by the young couple, who informed him that his new house was burned to the ground. He made no comment, get up, went over and quietly surveyed the scene of the confiagration. returned and ate a better breakfast
