SYNOPSIS.

On the 21st of July, 1894, Andreas Dorian, a Christian resident of Damascus, and a friend were attacked by a Turkish band of murderers of Christians having committed a massacre in the city of Damascus. Andreas Dorian was killed and his friend was severely wounded.

PART II.

"I am not surprised," I murmured to the sounds that were coming from the door, "I am not surprised."

where I caught sight of hurrying forms. Presently, I met a band of five murderers-looking wretches, one of whom accosted me.

"Come with us!" he said. "There is good game all about here."

"Nay," I answered. "I may not, for I have an account of my own to settle."

"May Allah speed you in the villain's execution, and the five hastened in pursuit of a poor stranger whom they at that moment espied."

After this, I felt assured of my disguise, and hurried onward with a freedom that I had never known before.

"I thought her most earnestly, and then hastily proceeded to array myself in the coarse garb of a Druse trader which she brought me."

"I hastened to fetch some kind of a drink from the fountain which she showed me, and then she pressed me to take some refreshments."

"I disposed of the weapons, but assured her that eating was quite out of the question, so she accompanied me to the inn."

"I was now nearing the quarter where the home of Glauce was situated, and I turned into a narrow way which took me in the rear of the Greek church."

"I should pursue, faintly I decided to take the most direct route, as in that direction there seemed to be less chance of being seen."
