Arthur hadn't been gone a week before I was almost sorry I sent him. It was weak-minded, but I couldn't help it. I did wish I had made some other arrangements with Uncle.

You see, Professor Empsen took it up, and he can do almost anything when he tries. He got the college pro-ple interested, and they fitted out a ship, and sent it off with two or three chemists-I think they were chemists-and a lot of special students who vanted to do "practical work." I think they wanted a good time as much as anything, myself. Arthur was in charge of the expedition, though, because it was his idea.

It wasn't quite so bad at first, for I kept getting letters-such good letters; but after awhile they stopped, and I didn't hear a word for months. That was the hard time. I never would have believed beforehand that I could be so worried. Uncle stopped talking against Arthur, too, but I think that made it seem worse.

Then another letter came-a great bly one, from somewhere in Australia had it torn open in a flash-then laid it down; I was afraid to read it, I must have been getting hysterical; I never used to be so silly. Anyhow, I carried it to my room and locked the door before I could muster courage to begin. It was as bad as when I was trying to make up my mind to let Aunt Julia bore my ears. But when I did begin I couldn't stop; I am sure I read that letter twenty times over. Some just me; but here is the part about the cave where they found the "substance," means entirely extinct—though it is so marked on the charts—but it was reasonably quiet during our stay. This was fortunate, for really the mountains is the island; and there is little else.

I observed, however, that they had razor-like flashes of a hard, greenish mineral, similar to the specimens shown us by Professor Emp-sen, which they used as knives, "When, after much effort and some hazard, we attained the mouth of the cavern, I ceased to blame them for their superstitious fear. It is indeed a grewsome spot. The opening is as jagged as the mouth of a shark, and is coated with a kind of green glaze, apparently deposited by the acrid vapors which almost continually arise from the dark interior. This hideous hole led downward at a very steep angle until it was lost in the gloom; most terrifying sounds of hissing and rumbling issued out of it, the fumes were anendurable, and we despaired of being able to explore it.

"At length, however, a sharp breeze from the sea dissipated the vapors for a time, and I found, to my surprise. that a current of air was drawing into the aperture. It was now or never, and I had everything at stake, just think, dearest, you were the stake, with undoubtedly a crystal of helium, develshame and disappointment worse than oped under extraordinary conditions death as the alternative. So I fastened a stout rope under my arms, pressed the hands of my comrades, murmured the name I love, and with it part of a prayer that I learned which I was a glaze at the mouth of the cave. This substitute for God at such a momentthen began to scramble down into the supports of the same material, and the awful pit. For about sixty feet the de-scent was almost perpendicular. "Slowly the massive crystal began to show signs of heat. Its native hue was lost in a dusky red, which bright-ened until it was vivid scarlet; then, as the heat grew more intense, it became white-hot and shone like the noonday sun.

"Thus far,' explained Professor Empsen, 'the phenomena, though impressive and beautiful, have been not unfamiliar. As the electricity raised the temperature of the helium it commenced to give off waves, or vibrations, could not be seen because they were too low to be registered by the human eye. Then as the heat mounted, red rays, the lowest and slowest which the eye can detect, began to appear, and we said that the bar was red-hot. As the heat still increased, yelow waves, made the grotto ring like a migtly which are a little quicker, became wind-swept harp. mingled with the red, giving a bright cherry color. "And now the wonderful substance which was to form the basis of the experiment was borne in. It appeared to be about the size and shape of an elephant's tusk, but more slender; and Its weight was such that twelve strong men were hardly able to carry it. "He shut off the current, The cooling crystal began to sparkle with violet light. This merged in a glow of blue, which slowly subsided to a white heat; this sank to red; and dulled, and faded; again the light and color of this rainbow of helium adament had vanished.

"It has again fallen below the range of human vision,' said the Professor, exultantly. 'The demonstration is complete."
