In the short fourteen years of Annie Hock's life, the bitter seem to have predominated over the sweet. Her mother died when Annie was but 11 years and the oldest of four children, a sister and two brothers. Two years later the children became orphans by the death of the father, Mr. Hock left property on Crown avenue, valued at $1,000, and requested a neighbor to act as executor and also guardian to his children. The three youngest were placed with Mrs. Dankurith, of Crown avenue, and Annie went to reside with Mr. and Mrs. John Schroedel, of Cedar avenue. Sunshine filled Annie's life for a time, but last April her good friends departed to reside in Germany. Mrs. William Forkel took the lonely girl to her home and cherished her. Annie to show her grati-ture, and not desiring to be a burden, procured work at the silk mill. Again the silver lining to the cloud was apparent to her, but alas! her cup of bitterness indeed now "runneth over." Mrs. Dankwirth has issued a warrant to compel Annie to come and reside with her. When told of the intention of Mrs. Dankwith, she cried and clung to Mrs. Forkel, saying, "I will not go! I want to stay with you!" No one seems aware of the office from which the warrant was issued. WITHDREW HIS OBJECTION.

It was evident that the gray-haired old gentleman was put out about something.
"Yesterday," he said, "I heard you refer to me as 'the old man."
"Very likely," replied the young man.
"Well, I don't like it." returned the old gentleman. "I suppose you meant nothing wrong, but it is disrespectful. I have always tried to be fair and considerate with the boys in the office and I don't like to be repaid in this way." "Did you ever know of anyone who was inpopular being called 'the old man?"

'When a man is known through an office as 'Mister' isn't it a 10 to 1 bet that he is pretty generally disliked or feared?"

The old gentleman thought it over for "Perhaps," he said at last, "in view of my own recollection of an 'old man' and how I regarded him I'd better withdraw any objections to the term."—Chicago
