A VOICE FROM THE SEA.

The post had just arrived at a lit- | to myself to write my heart's history tle up-coultry station in South Aus- Three years ago I was happy as any me eager crowd round the postoffic was dispersing, and a man who o not seem to have expected anyths was examining the wrapper ewspaper which had been his of a f the mailbag.

share widering, half aloud, who could by sent it, he threw himself down to on a bench outside the local bar. "Hullo, Blyth!" cried a lounger, hever saw you interested in a bit of news before. What's up?" The man addressed, a handsome fellow, but careworn and emaciated, gave no reply. He had hurriedly run his eye down the columns and now held the paper open on his knee, staring at a paragraph broadly marked in blue

"So." he murmured under his breath. "Gilbert Fane married, and Lilian forgotten."

The onlooker laughed and confided to a friend that old Blyth was always queer, while the recipient of the newspaper after remaining for a while burted in thought rose and made his way down the road to a better sort of frame hut, the interior of which bore unmistakable traces of refinement. In truth, some of the contents would not have disgraced a lady's drawing room in Adelaide. They were an old Japanese cabinet, a workbasket, a pret-tily cushioned deck chair, and other knick-knacks such as women choose.

The picture of a handsome girl of twenty hung in a massive silver frame the wall. This he walked straight up to, and gazed at the lovely face long and wistfully.

"You are mine now, Lilian," he said aloud, "your husband has married again. Do you hear, beloved? Do you mind, I wonder? Was his the name on your lips when-" Sighing deeply, he sat down before the cabinet and took from it a writing case manifestly feminine, which was stamped with the monogram L. F. It contained the usual paraphernalia of a woman's correscondence, a few diary letters, some loose sheets of paper, and a dainty little book with "Diary" in quaint gilt letters on the cover.

For two years this case had been Graham Blyth's most cherished possesion. Hearing that his old friend, Lilian Fane was returning to the colony he had gone to meet the steamer she was expected to arrive by, only to receive the terrible news of her death by drowning on the voyage out. It had been purely accidental, they aid. She had acquired a habit of sitting alone on the forecastle, and one evening must have stumbled over an anchor, and so fallen overboard. The ship had been stopped, and every effort made to save the unfortunate lady, who was a universal favorite, but to no purpose. She was never seen again. Her mother (married for the second time in the colony) was hartbroken, and had begged Blyth to ke p these belongings, pleading that the sight of would but renew her sorrow. And he had kept them like sacrificial mysteries, inviolate. But today, as he sat with the open writing case before him, and for the thousandth time touched each object with reverent care, the news of Gilbert Fanc's remarriage filled him with a sense of proprietorship which in a vague, unreasoning manner brought

She was his now. The other had forgotten her. He alone was true, even

It was longer than usual before he returned the derelict treasures to their resting places, they so vividly recalled to him Lillian's pretty methodical habits and quainty tidy ways. The diary he took up last, It was characteristic of the man that often as he had handled the little book, its clasp had never been unfastened. To himself on this point he had been inexorable. He had even begged Lilian's mother to send it to Mr. Fane, as being the last thing that her hand touched. It had been picked up on the forecastle where she used to sit. But this evening he felt differently. The husband owned Something that was another wife. akin to exultation filled Graham Blyth's soul. He held the tiny volume against his cheek caressingly, and azed at the pictured face above him, which to his excited fancy smiled ap-"Open it." the lips seemed to coval. ay. vept round the gables, "Be executor of her last wishes," urged his heart, "perhaps one remains unfulfilled." With a shiver Graham gently undid the clasps and began reading. At first the entries were brief and unimportant; only from a word here and there could the anxious survivor gather that his dead friend had not been as fully satisfied with her sur-roundings in England as he had beeved. But presently, coinciding with her final determination to revisit the Antipodes, the tone of the journal changed. All reserve was cast off, and he found himself feverishly perusing the innermost thoughts of a woman who confessed that life had become intolerable to her. The narrative burned like a hot iron into his brain:

Throb, throb! The monotonous pulsation of the screw is like the beating of a laboring heart. But existence on board a crowded liner in the midst of constant movement is, at least, not so hard to bear as the numb emptiness I have left, and which my folly brought me to. "I, Lilian Fane, aged twenty-threenot old enough to be tired of life, is it? -am impelled for my own justification girl that ever breathed. The warm, dry air of Adelaide had restored my mother to health, and the days passed like a dream. We had all we wished for, including many friends.

"Among the men who came most frequently to see us was Graham He was Australian born and bred. A fine fellow, with a heart like a romantic girl's. Another was Gilbert Gilbert was a man of the world, light-hearted, polished and with a synical wit that made him a delightful companion.

"Both said they loved me, but each thought I preferred the other. Nor was it easy to make up my mind. Looking back now I know that I cared for Graham best, and let him go only because I was dazzled by the apron. other's more brilliant gifts, and also because I was a little bit afraid of the roughness of an Australian life.

"This the poor fellow honestly realized, though he broke down completely when I told him one evening that I did not think the colony altogethe suited me, and as soon as my mother's health permitted it, we should go pack to Europe. He staggered as if he had been struck, but all he said was, You're the first and last woman I my home, no one else will.' With these words he left me, and I never saw him again.

"Am I going to see him now? "Then Gilbert proposed to me. He was obliged to return to England, and pegged me to promise to follow as soon as possible. I almost said yes, for mother was thinking of marrying again, and I was fond of him in a way. He tried every possible argument to nduce me to change my mind, but at that time to no purpose. He then got me to agree that if I ever thought better of his suit I was to write and tell

'Being thus over-persuaded, my mother's marriage threw me on my own resources. Graham made no sign, while Gilbert wrote constantly urging me to accept him. I held out a little longer. But everything was against Even my home had grown distasteful, and I knew myself no longer

"In due course came his answer. It was not so fervid as his previous protestations, but I thought this was owng to his not feeling quite sure of me. He begged me, however, to come home at once, his aunt would receive me with open arms, and we should be married from her house.

"On my arrival in England he was all affection and kindness. Still there was something in his manner not noticeable before. There was no longer that intense solicitude for my least wish which had so fascinated me in Australia-rather a certain offhandedness that prevented his welcome from ringing quite true to my now morbidlyawakened perceptions. At even that early date I began to fear it was foolish to write and offer one's self after some months' separation. I taxed him with being changed, but he strenuously denied that anything was wrong, and his aunt did her utmost to set my doubts at rest. She was never weary For a time they lulled my suspicions, but it was impossible to set them altogether at rest. Though without the strength to act on it, I had a conviction that Gilbert did not care for me as he used to, and lest possibly he had met somebody he liked better, I implored his aunt to speak to him before it was

"She laughed at my fears, but at length promised that she would at least nention them to her nephew. Perhaps it was the nearness of our wedding day that prevented her keeping her word. Alas for me! she left maters take their

"In less than a year I knew we were otterly unkuited to each other. By painful degrees the discovery dawned upon me that my husband was one of hose men who, without very strong eelings, are so governed by vanity as to consider a woman's refusal the worst shame that can come to them. He adnitted having acted as he had mainly in order to prevent my becoming the wife of Graham Blyth, and throwing him over. As for himself, he confessed he thought me too exacting and neurotic, not at all the sort of girl I had eemed in Australia, and hinted that f his aunt had put the matter plainly to him, he would have let me off.

"Then the utter hopelessness of my osition became manifest. I had forced nyself on an unwilling husband. It did ot take me long to decide what to do, A letter from my mother saying she was not very strong determined me, and my husband's last words were. 'I suppose you'll see Blyth?'
"Is there no way out of all this wretchedness? As I sit gazing over the ocean toward the East where Graham still lives in peace, the water looks cool and inviting. My heart hungers to see him, but I know my own weakness. I cannot believe he has forgotten me, and dare not tax his loyalty. "A plunge would be easy, and they would say it was an accident."

Graham Blyth closed the diary. Then his head dropped until it rested on the cover, and he fell on his knees beside

BEECHER REMINISCENCES.

How Mrs. Beecher Tried to Check Her Impetuous Husband.

From the New York Sun The great preacher was always ready for a joke, while Mrs. Beecher took everything seriously. Speaking of his first charge at Lawrencebury, Ind., where his salary was $300 a year, Mr. Beecher said:

"We were awful poor there, weren't we mother?" "We wight have been poorer, Hanry," said Mrs. Beecher, smoothing out her

"Yes," continued Beecher, "we were so poor that it was hard to get food to feed and wood to warm mother and the babies-' "Henry!" interrupted Mrs. Beecher, with an upward inflection.

"Yes, we were so poor that I used to have to catch floodwood out of the Ohio river. One day when I was right in the middle of a Sunday sermon, I ooked out of the window and saw the floodwood going down. I remember how shall ever love, and if you do not share I wanted to be out there catching that

"What did you do?" I asked. "Why, I rushed that sermon through roke off the head of it, and dismissed the congregation. Then I called my deacons back, and we went down to the river and got out floodwood enough to last me three months." And then with a laugh he glanced at Mrs. Beech er and said: "Didn't I mother?" "No, Henry, you never did any such thing," she said, biting her lips. "How absurd! "Did you stay in Lawrenceburg ong?" I asked. "Oh, no. I soon had a 'six hundred' call to Indianapolis, and I was glad to go. Mother had just written a book on the trials of a poor preacher, and it was getting warm in Lawrenceburg. Mother's book was written so close to life and was so personal that we had to stop it, and I've always been afraid that some publisher would dig it up again.

"In Indianapolis," continued Mr Beecher, "a grand thing happened to me that gave me my first publicity. I was invited to preach the dedication sermon for the First Congregational church in Fort Wayne, and was to be paid $25 for one sermon. This was an unheard-of price for one talk at that lime and it got into the newspapers, Even editorials were written about it Then, of course, all the papers printed the sermon-this twenty-five dollar sermon-and I was a proud man.

"I rode on horseback from Indianapolis," continued Mr. Beecher, "and vore so many holes in the seat of my mespun clothes that I was afraid to to back and let mother-was gone.

"Well. I borrowed some money o a young preacher named Storrs-he's Dr. Storrs now- and then went to Dr. Prime of the Observer and told him my trouble. Dr. Prime didn't have any money to lend. Then I offered to write letters at a dollar a week, giving all the church news from the west, to be published in the Observer if Prime would lend me money enough to get home. You know they have paid me $300 a column for such stuff "Did you ever really write newspape etters for a dollar a piece?" I asked "Well, I'll tell you about it," said

Mr. Beecher, his eyes twinkling with fun. "You see I wanted to write them, but Prime said he would consider it over night after consulting with his wife." "Of course Prime accepted your offer?" I suggested. "No, he came back the next day," said Beecher while a smile stole over his face, "and said he had given the proposition prayerful thought and had come to the conclusion that they wouldn't be worth it."

One day when I called, Beecher was bantering Bayard Taylor. "Bayard," he said, "I wish you would give up writing poetry and stick to lecturing and writing about your travels. Your poetry will never make you famous.' "I think differently," said Taylor. 'I know I can write good poetry. At any rate, I would rather be a thirdclass poet than a first class lecturer." "Well, said Beecher, "you ought to be happy then-you're both!"
