

"HENNIE."

Marco Morrow, in The Lotus.

The Beulah camp-meeting grounds were ankle-deep in mud and water...

"Well, brother, there ain't no signs of lettin' up yet!" Those families who camped under canvas...

"Well, you're gorn, Brother Hawkins?" he said. "I'm terribly sorry, I am so."

"No, I ain't!" began the woman in a still higher voice than before.

"No, I ain't a flindin' fault with the Lord," she said, "but with His unfaithful servant."

"An' I tell ye, Sister Hawkins," he shouted, "that I'm not a-gorn to give ye many before warnin'."

to save it from the flood. He drew it ashore and laid it on the grass.

"Poor boy!" said Miss Jenkins, turning her head away.

"Mim!" snuffed the mother contemptuously, drying her eyes and wiping her nose on the lower hem of her bedraggled skirt.

"The second boy, on the front seat with his father, was watching the family dog that splashed along beside the wagon, and when Hank was not absorbed in keeping the wagon out of chucked-holes, he too, looked at the dog and talked alternately to him and the boy."

"Hennie," she said, "I was jus' undone 'cause we had to come away. I wanted to stay so much, Hennie, an' I'd a-liked to see you."

"Room!" sniffed the woman. "Room!" she said, "there's seven rooms in that cottage. If there's one, a-sayin' Hennie of them divided off by sheets."

"No, I ain't!" began the woman in a still higher voice than before.

"No, I ain't a flindin' fault with the Lord," she said, "but with His unfaithful servant."

"An' I tell ye, Sister Hawkins," he shouted, "that I'm not a-gorn to give ye many before warnin'."

equally as ignorant of scorching bicyclers.

According to our correspondent—a veracious chronicler of South Jersey happenings—the agent was making good time and lifting a free and easy load to heaven, without a single fear of the browsing herds upon the rolling plains, when all at once the proverbial change came over the spirit of his dreams.

The situation grew decidedly alarming. The mild inquisitiveness of the steers had changed to anger, and they were going to run the peculiar species of cowboy down if it took any time.

A peculiar scientific experiment has been made with the famous skeleton of the New York Central railroad, at the shops at West Albany.

A short time ago the engine was taken back to the shops and mechanics were put to work dissecting it again. Once more every part was weighed.

When his Honor, Squire Balkcom, called the jury at this morning in the spacious umbrage of the tree that shadow his yard, he noticed a dusky son of Ham and his wife standing among the spectators with an anxious look upon their faces.

"I see come to get you to 'voice us, Judge," said his Honor.

"You have?" said his Honor.

"Yes, sah, boss; she shore did null my constitution; why—"

"Oh, go to Gehenna. I say I can't and won't separate you. Do you understand, now?"
