ONE SLIGHT DRAWBACK.

Tobacco Crop Saved from Hail, but Not from Drought.

"When I was farming in Carolina," said an old Connecticut fellow, "I got ahead of Providence in the hallstone business. After I had planted my crop of tobacco I rigged up a line of poles the entire length of the field, with ropes stretching from pole to pole, and to as cambric. By a system of pulleys any one standing at the edge of the field could pull the main guy rope and in five minutes the entire crop would be covered by this curtain or awning. I was taken ill about this time and my physician told me I must go to California for my health; so I went, but before going I instructed my wife how to work my device and told her that whenever she saw a storm coming to cover the crop.'

"And so the hall never damaged your tobacco?" inquired the little man with the chin whiskers.

"No, sir, never touched it. But then, you see," he added, leisurely taking a long pull at his eigar, "there wasn't any tobacco to ruin, for every time a storm came up my wife drew the curtains and the crop died from drought." -New York Tribune.

The Civil Service Reform For the Best Idea, Past and Present.

rise, progress, and present state of the merit system in the civil service of the United States." Mr. Brosius ranks high as a raconteur among his colleagues in the house, and this speech not only adds to his reputation in that regard, but places him in the front rank as a historian. As showing what great institutions can grow from small be-ginnings, he notes the first germ of civil service in Englard, and extortion from King John by the Barons at Runnymede, of this provision for seccuring duly qualified officers: "We will not have any justices, constables, or sheriffs, but of such as know the law of the realm and mean truly to observe

In the reign of Edward II, 1307 1327, it is said there was kept in a tower in Ludon six horseshoes and sixtyone nails, which, by an ancient custom, the sheriffs of London were compelled to count when they were sworn into office. Their ability to do so was re- ever heard of a perfectly indefensible garded as proof of sufficient education for the office, as only an educated man could count up to sixty-one. In 1388 parliament passed an act which provided-"that none shall be made oficers of the King for any gift, brokerage, favor, or affection, but upon de-

These are historical beginnings of civil service reform among Englishspeaking people. Centuries of abuses, in which extortionate levies upon the people ministred to the vices and luxuries of the few and the pleasure and power of Kings, Lords, and nobles were everything, while justice, equality, economy, and the personal worth of the citizen were nothing, were destined to elapse before the appointing power ceased to be the instrument alike of revenge and favor, to reward obsequious servility and compel acquiescence in the will of official despots. There is some humor mingled with the sadness of the reasons given by a custom-house officer for his submission to the royal will, reasons which to this day cause continuous reign of terror in the unclassified civil service of the United States. "I have he said, "fourteen reasons for obeying his majesty's command-a wife and thirteen children."

EARLY REFORMERS.

George Washington's elevation of mind and lofty patriotism is strikingly illustrated in a letter which he wrote to a friend from which Mr. Brosius makes this extract:

- I receive with cordial welcome to my house and welcome to my heart; but with all his good qualities he

So Jefferson, animated by the same to gain and nothing to lose.

Of the thousands of officers, therefore, the United States, a very few individmals only, probably not twenty, will be removed, and those only for doing what they ought not to have done. I know that in stopping thus short in the career of removal I will give great offense to many of my friends. That torrent has been pressing me heavily and will require all my force to bear up against, but my axim is fiat justitia, ruat coelum.

The origin of the spoils system, declares Mr. Brosius, began with the adninistration of Jackson, concerning which Daniel Webster said in 1832:

As far as I know, there is no civilized country on the earth in which, on a change of rulers, there is such an inquisiion for spoils as we have witnessed in his free republic. • • • The same party elfishness which drives good men out of office will push bad men in. Political pro-scription leads necessarily to the filling of offices with imcompetent persons, and a consequent malexecution of official duties.

Mr. Brosius, viewing the "in-andout" panorama of succeeding administhese ropes I attached a cloth material trations, which he speaks of as still exnot so stiff as crinoline nor so flexible sting, is reminded of a little story of a saloonkeeper at Winchester during the war:

The tide of battle swept back and forth through that little town seventysix times during the war. When the union forces were in possession the saloon-keeper wore a suit of blue, and when the Confederates returned he changed to a suit of gray, making the changes with such promptitude as not to disclose to the respective combatants the trick he was playing. After he war was over, a neighbor asked him how he managed always to be on the side that was in possession. He replied that the changes of occupancy were pretty fast, but they would have quick if they got ahead of

And the men who advocate civil service in theory and fall to apply it, brought out a story which Gladstone is eredited of having told of Lord Melbourne. The latter was seen coming from church one Sabbath in great excitement. Meeting a friend, he exclaimed

Readable Points Culled from a Recent Speech by Hon. Marriott Brosius, of Lan-

From the Washington Pest.

The Congressional Record recently to a man's private life. The following apt simile is credited to George William Curtis:

The doctrine of rotation in office im plies that merit should not be considered. It treats the public service as a huge soup house, in which needy citizens are to take turns at the table, and they must not grumble when they are told to move

A most striking crystallization of the spoils doctrine enunciated by Marcy in his famous utterance in the United States senate, and of which Burr, Jack-son, Tweed and Conkling were eloquent advocates, was the famous reply of Judge Barnhard on his trial for the corrupt use of judicial patronage: won this office, and its patronage is mine. Some years ago, at a dinner in New York, Prof. Huxley asked Senator Conkling what he thought of the civil service reform. The senator launched into an eloquent defense of the spoils system. Huxley was asked what he thought of it. He replied that it was the most eloquent defense he had thing. SPOILS A BURDEN.

President Lincoln once said he never ent to sleep without looking under the bed to see if a certain senator was here in pursuit of an office. At anther time, when he was sore distressed by these congressional importunities, said he could not get time to consider the Southern question. "I am," said he, "like a man so busy in letting rooms in one end of his house that he has not time to put out the fire in the other end." Secretary Windom said: In the last one hundred days a few thousand men in search of office have taken nine-tenths of the time of the resident and his cabinet. Dr. Andrew D. White, ex-minister to St. Petersburg and now president of the Venezuelan commission, is credited with telling of a member of congress with whom he conversed on an important measure. He asked the congressman why he did not make a great speech on the subject, educate the ountry, and extend his own fame. The oppressed statesman, holding out a undle of letters, replied: "I cannot do it, sir: I have not the time, Here are fifty unanswered letters from my constituents asking me to get offices for them."

As a contrast to this Mr. Brosius quotes a member of parliament, repreenting one of the most important districts in the United Kingdom, who thanked heaven that he "was powerless as to the appointment of the pettlest tide waiter in the Empire." Mr. Gladstone, too, once boasted that the only office in his gift was that of his own private secretary. Granting that Mr. Cleveland had heart; but with all his good qualities he is not a man of business. His opponent, with all his politics, so hostile to me, is a man of business. My private feelings have nothing to do with the case. As George Washington, I would do this man any kindness in my power. As president of the United States, I can do nothing. their share of offices. They have all

As illustrative of the practical working of competitive examinations in this respect, he related an incident told by Major Harlow, of the civil service commission, about B. B. Smalley, the wellknown Democrat, who was collector in Vermont: One day some of the party leaders came to the Vermont collector and complained:

"See here, Mr. Smalley, you have not got any Democrats in your office. These fellows holding the government positions are all Republicans."

"Well, what do you suggest?" asked the collector,

"We've got a couple of good Democrats and we want you to put out two Republicans and give them the places," was the reply "All right," said Mr. Smalley; "I am a little hampered, but I'll see what can be done. You see this list of names?" "Yes." "Well, run over it and see if you can find the names of your two Democrats

The politicians did as directed, One of them suddenly blurted out:

"What is this darned thing, anyway, Mr. Smalley?" "That," answered the collector, "is the list of persons who have passed the civil service examination. If any vacancies occur in my office force, the law requires me to fill them from the names on that list." "But these are all Republicans, Mr.

Smalley; there is not a Democrat on the list. "I am afraid not," said the cellector egretfully.

"The trouble is, our Vermont Democrats don't go to school, as they should, and, until they do, there is no way of getting them government positions." Major Harlow had also given Mr. Brosius an account of an experience while postmaster at St. Louis, which matches Mr. Smalley's story very well. Father Walsh, the shrewd rector of St. Bridget's parish, made a study of the civil-service law, and one day went to the postoffice and got a copy of the regulations governing examinations. The next time there was an examinathe solar system; bad light, planets tion at the postoffice a group of bright premote; pestered with comets, feeble young fellows from St. Bridget's parish choel put in an appearance as candidates. They had evidently been pre-pared with care. Some of them came out of the examination with the highest percentages and were given post-"That thing continued," said Major Harlow. "Father Walsh's young men would come out of the examinations at the top of the list, and under the law they would get the appointnents as vacancies occurred. One day some of my A. P. A. friends came into the office and said: 'Look here, Harlow, you are filling up the postoffice with Catholics. Why don't you give Protestants a chance?" "These incidents show," commended Mr. Brosius, "that the competitive system possesses the merit enjoyed by a certain church, which, a wag suggested, he preferred to any other, because it had nothing to do with either politics or religion."

had been discussing what they would like to be when they became n en and women, and the little fellow with the red hair had listened scornfully to the arious views expressed. "You all don't know nothin' about havin' a good, easy time," he said, when it came his turn to speak. "If we want to
