BEFORE BREAKFAST.

The meeting of the Homeopathic Medical Society of the state of Pennsylvania, recently held in this city, was a means of opening the eyes of the majority of the visiting members to Scranton's greatness, socially and in a business sense. This was remarked during the convention and a further evidence is offered in the following letter received yesterday by one of the city's physicians, who was very active in arranging the convention plans, from a Philadelphia member, one of the most prominent homeopaths in the country: 'Friend—: I want to thank you for the very hospitable reception you and the rest of the doctors and friends in Scranton gave us last week. Those who remained at home and did not attend the meeting, are now sorry they did not go with us. You have certainly made it definitely determined that Scranton will have the meeting three years hence—you will have us. Thank all the rest for their hourly attention to our several wants and the good lanes for their reception and kindly attentions. I took no dress suit for I thought I was going to a country town, but I shall have one with me at the next visit. With kind regards to Mrs. I am Very sincerely yours, Philadelphia, Sept. 28, 1897.

Mr. Will Jay is a young man of nerve. On Monday he submitted without anaesthetics to the removal of a piece of skin five inches long from his arm, to be employed in the engrafting process on the injured hand of his sister, Mrs. H. A. Connell.

The street commissioner or some one in authority should suggest to the Columbia Construction company that irregular stacks of lumber are not only an obstacle to traffic but also a heavy shaded sidewalk of Mulberry street, neither are loosely scattered bricks nice things to kick when walking along in the evening. Just a little care in placing these materials on the curb extension would save much profanity on the Hill.

A large reception is to be given at the Bicycle club next week for Miss Stella Seymour on her brief visit to America.

The number of women, young and old, in this city who are indulging in face massage and manicure treatment at the hands of a popular professional adept would surprise the uninitiated person.

FOR LATTIMER VICTIMS.

Contributions Are Asked by the Scranton Soliciting Committee.

The committee appointed at the indignation meeting, held at Nay Aug park Sunday, Sept. 19, to solicit funds for the relief of the victims of the Lattimer tragedy, at a meeting last evening, decided to ask the various benevolent organizations and individuals in this city and vicinity to contribute such amounts as they desire through the various members of the city, where the same will be acknowledged, or to the treasurer of the committee, C. G. Doland. A sub-committee was appointed to formulate an appeal to the public. It was the sense of the meeting that the appeal should be general and public rather than through personal solicitation.

COLORED SPORTS SHOW.

Opens a Three Days' Engagement at Davis' Theatre Tomorrow.

The Colored Sports' Big City Show is the next attraction, which opens tomorrow for the last half of the week at Davis' theatre. It is said to be composed of a goodly number of artists from the colored professional world, whose sweet voices and nimble feet, together with their inimitable powers of mimicry and correct conception of what is really droll and witty, enables them to present a truly clever performance. It is noteworthy that not one poor soul has ever been given at Davis' theatre by colored people, a number of pretty creole girls are with the aggregation.

FIVE MEN MET DEATH

o'clock yesterday morning and worked until 3 p. m. They followed the usual method in fighting mine fires, using picks and props and extinguishing the burning coal with water from a hose which had been run down into the mine from the outside. The first "shift" when leaving the mine at 5 o'clock reported no gas and gave encouraging stories of the progress in defeating the fire. Foreman Johns, who was in the mines all day, saw no immediate danger to the men.

The three o'clock shift—Gallagher, Smith, Tompkins, Franklin and Fire Boss Watkins—entered the mine and went at once to the affected part. Foreman Johns saw them about an hour later, he could not tell the exact time and he probably was the last man to see them alive. There was no sign of gas there; the air being as pure as usual. At 2:30 a time after the catastrophe as last night no plausible explanation of what caused the sudden accumulation of the deadly black damp could be given by the mine foreman. All that is known is that the men were dead and that everything goes to show that while they were at work a wave of black-damp came in one of the gangways and struck them. The men felt the deadly influence and dropping their tools they ran down the gangway in a south western direction toward the foot of the shaft. The place is about a quarter of a mile distant by surface measure. The first body was found at a distance of about fifty yards from the place of the fire.

The discovery was made by Robert White, John Way, George Schriver and Thomas Curley. These men were at work in another part of the mine as "company" men, and they were which remained for them to do before quitting work at 5:30 o'clock was to lead a truck with iron rails and transfer them through the mine to the place where the "3 o'clock shift" was at work on the fire. The rails were used, and after the fire had been extinguished, in extending the small road.

THE BODIES DISCOVERED. The four men, seated upon the truck, rode in to say good night, as they thought, to the men on the "shift." Curley, a young man of 22 years, drove the mule. The four men were within city yards of Digwood's counter when Curley who sat on the front part of the truck shouted "Whoa!" to the mule, and the mule sprang from the truck, jumped off and quickly thrust the springs in the small wheels of the truck, bringing it to a stand still. Without a word he dragged from the truck the body of a man. The mule had seen it and "whoa!" to the side, the truck stopping within a foot of the body. By the light of the miner's lamp the man was recognized as young Tompkins. They carried him to the "bench," or side of the mine, and, thinking he had been made unconscious by falling the men forced coffee between his lips. There was no water near by. Several minutes passed before they discovered that Tompkins was dead. They hurried up the track toward the fire and ten yards away they found White. He was dead. He was dead and his body lay between the rails, his face buried in the dirt between the ties. About the same distance further up Joe Smith was found. He also was dead, and the position of the body was exactly the same as that of Franklin and Tompkins.

The last body was that of John Gallagher. He was within a few yards of the place of the fire. The search was continued no farther. Leaving the three men to bury the bodies, the truck, young Curley ran to the foot of the shaft and took the carriage for the outside. Reaching the surface he rushed to the engine house and informed Engineer Kohler of the discovery. Then the whistle sounded three times, calling to the shaft outside Foreman Joseph Merritt and Inside Foreman Johns. Five minutes afterward the whistle again sounded three. Hearing it the people in the neighboring places started for the colliery.

WENT FOR THE BODIES. Foreman Johns, with Curley and a number of other miners who reached the engine house after securing a stretcher from the mine ambulance, took the carriage for the bottom. It was then 5:30 o'clock. Twenty minutes after the bodies of the young men and Tompkins were brought out, the crowd numbered over a thousand people. The opening of the shaft is situated about forty yards from the breaker and between this building and the skeleton structure over the shaft there is a wide level space covered with connecting tracks. To the east of the shaft there is a high bank and behind the shaft, on the west, is an embankment. Packed in with scarcely room to move about in this narrow rail-netted space were the people. Most of them were workmen, some still in their mining clothes, and here and there were women and children. The narrowing entrance to the mouth of the shaft was choked with the friends of the men whose names passed about from tongue to tongue. A babble of subdued voices arose and as the dusk deepened into night the scene, lit by the small lamps of the miners, was weird and impressive.

Suddenly three strokes of the gong at the top of the shaft announced that the carriage was coming up. The engines groaned, and the sound of the carriage striking the sliding gate was a signal for a rush for the opening. Watchman Bell and a score of miners forced an aisle through the people and the body of young Tompkins, who in the race in the mine had outstripped his companions, was carried out and into the engine house. His parents are dead, and the only other close friend, Isaac Watkins, the fire boss, was yet to be taken from the mine. After another wait of fifteen minutes the carriage was again hoisted. This time the bodies of Smith, Gallagher and Franklin, lying side by side on a truck, were seen.

AN AFFECTING SCENE.

The truck was run along the track to a point thirty feet from the shaft. Here it was necessary to lift the truck, the three bodies still upon it, to another track. While the truck was being lifted a man crying "My brudder, my brudder!" burst from friends who were holding him, and sprang upon the truck. He tore away the blanket from the face of Joe Smith and kissed him again and again, crying like a child, and wailing hot words in the Hungarian language. Smith's little son was crying pitifully near by. The truck was pushed along to the road, a hundred yards away, where the ambulance awaited it. Here Mrs. Smith, wife of the man, struggled to reach the body. Her eyes were heart rending.

Smith was taken home in the ambulance. The bodies of Gallagher and Franklin were removed to the engine house and finally an hour afterward the four men were taken in the ambulance to Minooka and Franklin to his home in Rendham. Tompkins was taken in Undertaker Davis' wagon to the house where Isaac Watkins lived. At last report Watkins' body had not been found. It was thought he ran in an opposite direction to the four other men. His wife is now visiting in Wales.

The closing scenes of the tragedy was the group of men and women surrounding the four men, and the discovery and listening to their story. Outside Foreman Merritt stated that the colliery was shut down indefinitely. He could not explain the catastrophe; the "fan" had been kept in full motion all the time.

SCENE AT GALLAGHER'S HOME. When the ambulance brought the dead body of John J. Gallagher to his home in Minooka, it is some that one of the four men, who had been with children and his relatives and his neighbors knew nothing about the dread casualty until the ambulance drew up at the gate. In a few minutes nearly everybody in Minooka looked to the house, and the lamentations were loud enough to be heard several blocks away.

The dead man's wife was frantic with grief, and his little children cried so loud and piteously that there was scarcely a dry eye among all assembled. Mrs. Gallagher had to be left with the body for a long time, and it was only after she was prostrated that she could be got away. His father, too, a gray-haired old man, was almost an unconquerable. Wife and father and the children threw themselves upon the body, caught up by the dead hands, and begged the lifeless remains to speak. In all the mine fatalities that ever took place, the Lackawanna brewery, with its hops and grain and various other like adjacent places with their several odor producing adjuncts.

MR. BURNS' PUN. It was also contended that the Gavigans keep a large brood of chickens and that these were in part responsible for the noisomeness of the locality. "A fowl odor, you would call that, I suppose," broke in Mr. Burns, much to the annoyance of the ever-earnest and serious Mr. Watson. That oil could flow from the company's storage house into Gavigan's cellar was claimed by the defense to be an impossibility, as the cellar is on higher ground than the plot on which the tanks are located. There was testimony for the plaintiff yesterday to the effect that when the Roche counter sewer was being opened the contractors struck oil and at the time it was firmly believed that the fluid came through the rocky strata from the oil house. The oil company, however, explained away that supposition. Two barrels, which had a little oil in the bottom of them, were used to guard the excavation. During the night they were overturned and the oil found its way into the sewer.

The jury, it is expected, will begin this morning to ponder on all these things, the evidence on both sides being nearly all in.

THEY MAY ADJUST THEIR DIFFERENCES

Judge Gunster Suggests an Amicable Settlement of Old Forge Coal Suit.

PARTIES ARE THINKING IT OVER

This Morning Will Tell Whether or Not the Case Goes to the Jury—Defense in the Suit of Gavigan Against the Atlantic Refining Company Has Several Novel Features—Mr. Burns on Deck with His Little Joke.

An effort was made by Judge Gunster yesterday to induce the parties in the case of the Old Forge School district against Jermy & Co. to get together and amicably settle their differences. They were thinking the matter over last night and there is a possibility that the litigation may be withdrawn this morning. Jermy & Co., it appears, through some error mined some coal from one of the veins underlying the school district's property. The school board and the Jermys came together when the trespass was discovered and proceeded to an amicable settlement. It was agreed that Jermy & Co. should pay the school district for the coal already mined at the rate of thirty cents a ton and should contract to mine the rest of the coal under the school property within three years at a corresponding royalty. There was a hitch over the extent of the land which the district owned, and the contract was never carried out. Now the school district is suing to recover for the coal that has been mined.

CAUSE OF HITCH.

The hitch comes from the fact that Jermy & Co. claim that inasmuch as the only title the district has shown for the land it professes to own is that of continuous and adverse possession for twenty-one years, it cannot own, as it alleges, a plot 10,000 feet square that is without the fence lines. Jermy & Co. are willing to carry out the agreement as far as it covers the fenced-in territory and if indemnity is given against litigation for the remaining portion they will contract for the whole plot. If some way is found to overcome this obstacle an amicable adjustment is likely.

The school district points out that when the original contract was made this distinction was not mentioned. No one disputes its ownership and there is no law or reason that would expect it to become an indemnifying company for the benefit of the lessees.

In the suit of James Gavigan against the Atlantic Refining company, which continued all day yesterday before Judge Edwards, the defendant attempted to show that the stenches complained of do not come from its oil house, but from the surrounding factories and works, the Boles wheel works, with its soft coal smoke; Kelly's bakery, with its wood fire; the Lackawanna brewery, with its hops and grain and various other like adjacent places with their several odor producing adjuncts.

MR. BURNS' PUN. It was also contended that the Gavigans keep a large brood of chickens and that these were in part responsible for the noisomeness of the locality. "A fowl odor, you would call that, I suppose," broke in Mr. Burns, much to the annoyance of the ever-earnest and serious Mr. Watson. That oil could flow from the company's storage house into Gavigan's cellar was claimed by the defense to be an impossibility, as the cellar is on higher ground than the plot on which the tanks are located. There was testimony for the plaintiff yesterday to the effect that when the Roche counter sewer was being opened the contractors struck oil and at the time it was firmly believed that the fluid came through the rocky strata from the oil house. The oil company, however, explained away that supposition. Two barrels, which had a little oil in the bottom of them, were used to guard the excavation. During the night they were overturned and the oil found its way into the sewer.

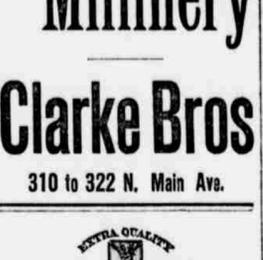

The jury, it is expected, will begin this morning to ponder on all these things, the evidence on both sides being nearly all in.
