DEATH WAS ACCIDENTAL.

Due to Patrick Gallagher's Inexperience, the Jury Said.

Nothing tending to show neglect or fault played developed from last night's inquest into the death of 15-year-old Patrick Gallagher, of Elm street, who was killed Thursday morning by falling from an ascending carriage in the Mt. Pleasant shaft. James Mangin, the boy who was on the carriage with him at the time, said that the carriage had only started when he heard Gallagher gasping as if he had been taken back away and the next instant he saw him stagger and pitch head foremost lengthwise on the carriage platform. At about the same time this happened the carriage started on its upward trip and it could not tell what happened afterward. The witness stood near the side and had hold of the iron braces. Anthony English, Henry Gardner and Thomas Ford, foreman, all testified that the signal "to hoist men" was given and answered and that the carriage was hoisted at the usual speed. John Hoern, the engineer, testified as to the signals and also swore that he hoisted the carriage on that trip at the usual speed when men are aboard. John Van Bergen, foreman of the colliery, testified that there is a rule against allowing any persons except workmen to go down the mine without permission. It was impossible however to strictly enforce this rule as the headmen do not know all the employees. John Gallagher, father of the boy, was present and asked several questions. The jury rendered a verdict to the effect that the boy came to his death by accident and that the accident was due to his own inexperience.
