From the New Orleans Times-Democrat,

"I see the papers are reviving the story of Rudyard Kipling's San Francisco experience in journalism," re marked a reporter who is familiar with the traditions of the coast, "but they have it all wrong. Cassier's Magazine. During the dozen or more years in which fighting vessels have been changing into their present forms much has been said about the dangers and responsibilities that the development has brought to the engineering staff. In even the largest of the older types of warships the post of the engineer as on a working platform over the horizontal cylinders, and nearly, if not quite, as high as the level of the berth deck. Above him was a large hatch or trunk, wide open to the spay deck, through which he could see the sky and hear all that was doing in the management of the ship. It also supplied him with fresh air, sometimes too liberally when sails overhead were set, as the writer recalls many instances of wearing an overcoat on an engine room watch. No water-tight bulkheads or air locks interrupted the unity of the power plant; the engineer from his station commanded an unobstructed view of the fire room, as well as of the engines, and he could reach any part of his domain with his voice. In the final emergency, escape from engine and fire rooms was quickly and easily made by ladders, extending to the upper decks. All that has been changed. Watertight buikheads, air-tight fire rooms and battle hatches have transformed the engineer's place of duty into a number of steel cells, almost as inaccessible, one from another, as though they were in different townships. Instead of one big engine room, there are now two, three and even four, each in its own water-tight compartment, and the big street-like fire room, into which the sunlight used to shine, has given place to as many as eight narrow black holes, cased in from all the world, Even the long shaft alley that was

The plan of the clock is that of an early renaissance structure walnut wood being employed for the frontage and the wings, The mechanism is calculated for a cycle of one hundred years, and requires winding once a month. Not only are the seconds, minutes quarters, hours, days, weeks, months and years indicated, but also the chief religious festivals of the year and the four seasons. These latter are heralded in with music or the seasonable singing of birds, accompanied with the play of beautifully carved figures. These make their appearance with mathematical accuracy at the second on which each of the four season commences, according to the calendar. In the midst of the clock six steps lead to the church doors. At 9 every morning these open and disclose the interior of a tiny Roman Catholic cathedral, where mass is celebrated by automaton figures to the sound horal music. Above the portal the painting changes four times a year to mark the four great festivals-Good Friday, Easter day, Pentecost and Christmas-which, of course, fall on different days of the week and month each year. On each of these occasions appropriate music heralds the appearance of excellently carved wood figures. The mechanism, says the inventor, is simple in the case of fixed festivals, but Iron Beds, etc. Five large floors full becomes vastly more complicated for the movable feasts, which are calculat ed with mathematical precision according to the calendar for the next one hundred years.
