beddu, who was killed in a fight with the carabineers. * A complete history of his career is now obtainable. It is interesting for its Dick Turpin-like Corbeddu was no ordinary brigand. He did not go about shooting fishermen or muleteers for the sake of the few lives they might have in their pockets, but he carried on his profession in a manner so distinguished as to make him the king of the Sardinian outlaws. He was born in 1844 at Oliena, in Sardinia, of a well-to-do family, and until called to do military service he lived an agricultural life. He took part in the capture of Rome in 1870, but while stationed with the Bersaglieri regiment, which then formed parts of the Rome garrison, his predatory instincts awakened. Having house. To the great surprise of the robbers, the priest was at supper. They seized, bound and gagged him and stole 1,300 lire from his bureau. The authors of the crime were never discovered until Corbeddu in after years boasted of his achievement. After returning to Sard'nia from his military service Corbeddua was re-heard that a certain priest was wealthy, he with an accomplice, made a peatedly tried for cattle stealing, until one day he falled to answer to a summons and took to the hills. At this point began his celebrated exploits. First, with an armed band, he stole a sum of money from a house at Lula in 1882. The same year he and other outlaws killed and robbed a man at Sanvero Milis. In 1884 he fought and nearly killed a carabineer at Fonni. In 1885, he, with some companions, killed a carabineer and nearly killed an inspector and another carabineer at Orani and stole a sum of 14,000 lire. Next year he robbed the post and deprived Count Spada, who was in the diligence, of his watch .rings, gun and big boots. The big boots Corbeddu afterward were in honor of his exploit. In 1894 he killed and robbed a wealthy man at Borore. Many other crimes were put down to him or were comunitted by minor brigands under his or-Hewards amounting in all to ders. 22,000 lire were offered for his capture, but in vain. His most famous exploit was not the capture, but the liberation of two Frenchmen, MM. Praile and Paty, who suthin of the sort, ain't they? I heard had been seized and held to blackmail so, but I couldn't believe it. It's really by other brigands. Their capture gave rise to a violent campaign in the whole French and Italian press against the condition of the Sardinian police, and Signor Crispi, who was then premier ordered the authorities in the island to liberate the two Frenchmen at all costs. All the carabineers were mobilized, and the telegraph officers worked night and day, though without discovering the prisoners. At last a subprefect named Marongin appealed to Corbeddu by means of one of his friends. The subprefect and the brigand had an interview, in which the official promised Corbeddu anything he might wish on condition that he would get the Italian administration out of a bad scrape. Corbeddu at once accepted the task liberating the Frenchmen, and within twenty-four hours they were delivered safely into the hands of the authorities. Corbeddu's professional pride was so great that he would accept neither the 10,000 lire reward offered him nor a free pardon, nor any other mpensation, considering himself sufficiently paid by having done in twenty-four hours what ministers, prefects and an army of carabineers had been unable to accomplish.

From that time he gave up his murlerous expeditions and enjoyed in peace the fruits of his robberies. He kept herds of cows and pigs and flocks of sheep and goats. He lived in a cave on an almost inaccessible mountain peak, to which the path was known only to himself and his brother. The cave was separated from the path by a precipice, over which Corbeddu passed on the trunk of a small tree. Calse key and engered the priest's drawing the trunk after him into the cave. On one occasion a daring thief discovered Corbeddu's hiding place and WM. CONNELL, President. robbed him of a quantity of the stores he had accumulated. He would frequently surprise the mouflon hunters and show them the best district in which to look for game. Though a Sardinian, he almost always spoke Italian, and manifested great disdain for the other outlaws, whom he called guastamestieri, or "trade spoilers." Lately he seems to have got into the bad books of the carabineers, by whom he was killed after a hard fight some three weeks ago.

The Villager Knew Him.

From New York Commercial-Advertiser. When he was fifty he returned to his native town, "just to see how the old place looked." He found it unchanged. The old store where, as a lad, he had elerked it, and sold calice and groceries to the old farmers, was just the same. He contrasted the sleepy old place with himself and felt a glow of satisfaction when he thought how much those thirty years had done for "They ought to be proud of me. he said to himself.
