ed. It is not contagious, but the conditions which produce it infect all within reach.

One after another was stricken on the ice-locked ship. In their case, a lack of fresh vegetables and the fetid air of the cabin produced the disaese. Citric acid was administered in boiled water and Dr. Vetter prescribed and nursed the sick men. He amputated the toe of one who had been herribly frozen and finally when this man, Mr. McCall, and the mate died he assisted in making the coffins and thawing the earth with fires to make their graves.

DIFFICULTIES OF BURIAL.

They could not be buried for nearly week because of the difficulties of interment. Then he placed bent so that dogs could not scratch loose the caskets of the sleepers. Over the forspoke the last words. Then he fell sick, although caring for the others, three of whom, including Rhinenart, his bunk companion, died. Of their burial he knows nothing.

Then the two men who were camping up the river returned and helped to nurse the stricken ones. But they kept continually torturing their patients with boasting complaints of how much they were doing for them and refused to give the necessary care. Dr. Vetter in desperation said: "If all these poor fellows had been such as you I should have left them and gone to the mission for I was the last to fall sick."

For the first time in telling his story as the memory of all his awful bardships, the selfdenial, the long and cruel winter, came over him, Dr. Vetter's voice faltered in the recital and burying his face in his hands he wept, with his wife, down whose checks the silent tears had been coursing.

On April 19, the members of the Ingraham party up the river came down and discovered the awful condition of the survivors and pushed on to Kotzebue mission. Major Ingraham called a meeting asking for volunteers to the rescue. One of his own men. Ralph Sheaf, was the only one who offered. The major himself, with the Missionary Semmer, and a few others, including a Chinaman cook and an Indian, started on the expedition.

In the meantime the little handful of dying men-only four of them were left on the boat-awaited the relief. Dr. Vetter had reasoned that at the latest the rescuing party would return by May 18. 'The date passed and despair settled down upon them. "I never expected to get away," said the doctor. "Then it was I gave up all hope. We knew that no one could be found to come to our relief." graham's party was within three miles. of the Elk. They came to an ice gorge where the waters were flooding from the upper rivers. Then occurred one of the bravest incidents in the history of the Yukon. Major Ingraham and one other clambered over the mountain of blocked-up ice and reaching the farther side found the water rushing about its base. The major undressed and with his clothes held above his head waded into the ley flood. More than once it almost carried him away but his marvelous courage and that of his companion won and after many other hindrances the schooner was reached. All this was for humanity's sake alone. just as Dr. Vetter had stayed on the vessel and nursed strangers.

A LONG JOURNEY.

On May 26 the sick men were put into a tent. As soon as the river was clear the Elk set out for Kotzebue mission. Many vicissitudes occurred on the journey to St. Michaels, including the grounding of the vessel and a transfer of ownership of the same. Practically, Dr. Vetter has been since the first of June endeavoring to get home.

Dr. Vetter, like Mark Twain, is in a position to state that "the news of his to compete by railroad. He said there death was greatly exaggerated."
