Joseph Murray Made a Prisoner in J. M. Alexander's Tailor i nop.

About 6 o'clock yesterday morning Miss Mattie Spettigue, a dressmaker, who sleeps over the tailoring establishment of J. M. Alexander, on North Church street, heard unusual noises on the floor beneath. She gave an alarm from her front window and a man named Boyle, who works for the electric light company, was first to respond. In a few minutes the place was surrounded and the escape of the made impossible. Constable Neary was summoned and, with a couple of assistants, entered the store and arrested Joseph Murray, who offered considerable resistance and lay on the sidewalk a couple of times on way to the station house.

Later it was noticed that he had for a pillow in the jail a brand new overcoat belonging to Mr. Alexander and that he wore the vest of a suit ready for delivery to Prof. H. J. Hockenberry.

Murray gained entrance to the building by knocking a large pane of glass out of rear door. He had been out of jail only a few weeks, having served time for smaller offenses committed at McNulty's restaurant and the cash store on South Main street.
