LAST WORDS OF GREAT MEN.

Mozart wrote his requiem under the conviction that the monument he was erecting to his genius would prove a monument to his own remains. When it was being chanted he called for the score, and as he handed over it, he said: "Did I not tell you truly that it was for myself that I composed this death chant?"

Bevick, the famous word engraver, was last employed to engrave the inscription of "The Old Horse Waiting for Death," and Hogarth delineated the death of all things, and, having given it the last touch, seized his palette and broke it in pieces, remarking: "I have finished."

Goethe's dying lips murmured something about a beautiful woman's face and Napoleon's last thoughts were for the head of the army, while Diarwell, some quarter of an hour before his death, raised himself a little in his bed and stretched himself out in the old familiar way that he was wont when rising to reply in debate, while his lips moved in silence.

De Laney, the great mathematician, was asked "The square of twelve men, he was not longer able to recognize his friends about the bed, and mechanically answered, "144."

Some Paris newspapers lately started the story that a compromising letter from General Gallifet to the Pretender was included in the evidence of an Orleanist plot in the hands of the High Commission. The French War Minister puts an end to the story in a letter addressed to the editor of Le Figaro.

"I admit that I have written a letter to M. the Duc d'Orleans to avoid all misunderstandings I insist on stating the exact facts.

"In the month of November of December of 1898 the Duc d'Orleans did me the honor of writing an invitation to me to hunt at Wood-Norton. I replied to M. the Duc d'Orleans that I was not rich enough to accept his very kind invitation.

"A few days later, through my friend the Marquis de Lau, M. the Duc d'Orleans made me the offer to pay the expenses of my trip to the country, which I replied, verbatim this time, that I was not poor enough to accept this gracious offer.
