Thomas Reddington, John Peyton and Peter Tolan, old-time residents of the neighborhood, and Charles S. Cowell, who is employed nearby as a watchman, testified that there never was a crossing there and that there was no travel across the tracks at that point. The first witness for the defendants was C. C. Mattes, land agent for the Lackawanna Iron and Coal company, and the Delaware and Hudson company had nothing to do with it. Contractor Conrad Schroeder testified that his teams daily crossed the tracks at Poplar street during the erection of the Bolt and Nut company's buildings. J. H. Crogan, manager of the Lackawanna Brewing company; W. D. Zehnder, president of the Bolt and Nut company; J. M. Volt, a Bolt and Nut company employe, and William Hetselroth, employe by the Lackawanna Iron and Coal company as a watchman at the garbage dump, gave testimony tending to show that the crossing was generally used by the public for a long time preceding its blocking by the fence which the railroad company erected.
