The little children reflected much credit on their teacher and it must be a matter of congratulation to Miss Stearns that they all did so well.

We have heard several complaints from people of the borough who have to patronize the first street car going north in the morning, on account of the overcrowding of the car by the workmen engaged in making the alteratlons along the track. While at ordinary times the car is pretty well filled by passengers, the addition of the rangs of workmen picked up along the oad make it most uncomfortable, For reveral mornings past as many as sixty eople have been crowded into the car, and the people complaining appear to be talking with reason when they say the company ought to run an extra car for their workmen.

The bazaar which has been running in Enterprise hall for several nights was brought to a successful close last evening. #### MARINE MONSTERS.

Sailors as a Class Do Not Believe in

Sen Serpents. F. T. Bullen in London Star.

To the curious in such matters it must be intensely interesting to note how vigorous, even in these latter days, and in the most prominent centers of civilization, is the craving atter one of the most ancient of all the world's myths. An immense volume continually for nine years. We tried of the sea-serpent legend, beginning all kinds of medicines and doctors away back in the twilight of history without receiving any benefit from any and carried right down into this presment of this medicine and thought of tain of apparently unimpeachable evidence might be collected in favor of the existence of such a monster or monsters that the most skeptical of mankind, being unpossessed of any personal experience of the matter, might well be excused for giving in their allegiance to the belief in seg serpents, even though they were represented as hugely incredible as the nillion-league-long specimen portrayed in the Brahminic account of the universal deluge. But it will be found that, although of course all the reports of sea serpents having been seen are received from seafarers, seamen as a class do not believe in the existence of any such creature. Moreover, if those reports be submitted to careful investigation it ill invariably be found that there are so many elements of doubt attaching to the description of the monsters seen that by-and-by the only clear thing remaining about such yarns will be, that something has been seen under certain abnormal conditions which has seen hastily pronounced serpentine in character. Afterward, with the natural tendency to embelish a story which all narrators are prone to, definite detalls have been added until some hideous worm, worthy to take its place among the nightmares of the "elder slime," has been evolved.

In the course of my wanderings in little-frequented parts of the watery world I have come in contact with many queer fish-so queer, in fact, that I feel bound to make every excuse for those who, having been brought in contact time, have brought home hair-raising stories about the sea serpents-aye! and have taken affidavits as to the truth of their reports, too. But it must be said also that many of these yarns eave their concoctors without excusfor it should at once have been evident to a seaman that the monster viewed was nothing more serpent-like than a rorqual, one of the long, slender whales that are found on the coasts of nearly every country in the world. The latest story from Chmpbelltown bears all the marks of being built up out of a rorqual, its "lugsail" fins having doubtless sprung up mushroomlike under the eye of the observer. Or, more likely still, it may have been a basking shark, of which many specimens have been seen in British waters twenty feet longa length that would easily and naturally lend itself to triple expansion.

Undoubtedly the basis of the majority of sea-serpent stories is the gigantic cuttle-fish, observations of which have been handed down to us from the remotest times, although strange to say, within the last century even scientific men found it easier to accept seaserpent fables as true than accurate details about huge cuttlefish. On June 4, 1896, I published in Nature an account of a conflict between a sperm whale and an immense cuttlefish, being moved thereto by reading a translation of a paper read by the prince of Monaco before the Academie des Sciences at Paris on his discovery of fragments of a huge cuttlefish in the ejecta of a sperm whale which he saw killed off Terceira. And I then stated that such a sight would abundantly Another of the Brockaway series of justify any number of sea-serpent intertainments was given at the Ly- yarns, with waving manes, glaring eyes, sail-like fins-in fact, all the usual appendages. My soher account drew forth from the veteran Dr. Andrew Wilson the remark, in the Illustrated London News of July 11, 1896, that I had finally settled the sea-ser-Shattuck, A. C. Robinson, L. H. At the Natural Higtory museum a small specimen about three feet long (tentacles and all) may be seen. Go and look at it, and imagine it increased to 25 times its present size, and say then whether you think that the mind of man ever conceived anything more calculated to make the

A NOVEL BULL FIGHT.

The Victim Takes the Offensive and Causes a Panic.

Parris Correspondent Lenden News. The world of fashion betook itself today to Deuil, near Engheln, to see a real bull fight, in which the bulls were to be killed. It was to be, moreover, a patriotic bull fight, as Robert Fellx, a Landals, was to be the first torero, Llaverito and Lagartillo were not to be so forward. The performance was greatly advertised, and meant to draw la haute canaille"-a name to which society, as represented by the White Carnation, is, I fear, entitled-and it must be said that the bait was geredily snapped. Special trains were organized, as for Chantilly on racing Sundays. All the "mondains," all the sportsmen who wanted to flout the president by absenting themselves from Long-champs, all the elegant women, who seemed to sniff with delight the butchery of bulls from afar, all the riff-raff from above and below, all the people who were curious to see what a pairiotic bull fight on Spanish lines was like. hastened to Deuil. The circus was packed from the boxes to the topmost round of seats. The circular gangway behind the palisade was so thronged that nobody could move in it. Instead of two rows of high paling, as in Spain, there was only one row, and it was not very high. In a Spanish arena the bull, when greatly teased, may jump over the row bordering the arena, but not over the second. He rushes round between the two paling suntil he comes to a gate, which is thrown back, It stops his course, and, in flying back, opens a wide way to the arena, into which the bull again goes, Expectation was at its height today. Robert, the champion of France, did not wear the flat Spanish cap, but a Pyrenean beret, slightly on the side of his head. He and Llaverito and Lagartillo were greeted with deafening cheers. The buil, a fine animal, on entering, at once rushed at the two toreros, who jumped lightly aside, and then at a picador armed with a lance. A chula drew him off by flourishing a red cape before his eyes. The buil wanted to get away, and cleared the single paling at a bound. A panic ensued. The animal blindly rushed along, with head down and horns forward. He cleared the excuse for a palisade in the front of the boxes, entered a gangway and climbed the first and second row of scats. Fortunately, he was only bothered and stupid, and not infuriated. The shrieks, the rushing people, suddenly brought him to his senses. and he stopped short and looked goodhumoredly about, but a terrified lady eaught him by a horn and another raised her parasol and hit him between the eyes with it. The poor animal broke away again, and, finding his way down a passage, escaped into the field in which the arena stands. It was filled with cycles. The bull tossed a lot of them about, and was sitting down to quietness when he found himself pursued by picadors, chulas, matadors and toreros, gendarmes and policemen, the latter armed with revolvers. Again the bull made off. There was a general discharge of pistols, but so wild was the firing that the wonder is he only was shot. He made one more rush when wounded, got entangled in a wire fence and fell. A buil fighter then stabbed him in the neck, and there was an end to the poor toro. The bull was from the pastures of the Duke of Verogna. He was named Romito, and was black, powerful and long-horned. Romito was one of those bulls that graze with sheep, and are quiet as lambs unless teased. Before it left Spain it was taught to assoclate the "Marseillaise" and "Carmen" with teasing, which shows that buils can receive a kind of musical education. Both airs were played yesterday before the door of the toril was swung back and Romito bounded into the arena. The music, it appears, was on his nerves when he leaned across the palisade into the laps-of all people-of a butcher and his wife. It is stated that the bull fights which are nounced to take place next Sunday at Enghien will be prohibited.
