Remember those who begin of the immense strides in invention and the adoption by newspapers of every avenue of progress has made it absolutely ne essary for or mote from the centers of population they may be, if they do not wish to fall hopelessly behind the times. The young men and women who have already enrolled their names in this contest or who are contemplating doing so will find their way smoother today in securing new subscribers than at almost any time in the past. The news of the war in South Africa has no sooner commenced to fall from the flood tide of active interest than tidings of the reported massacres in China have aroused the sentiment of the people to a high tension. A few years ago the man in a small town who took a daily paper was regarded as an extremely enterprising citizen; today the small farming communities are counted upon to furnish a very substantial portion of the circulation, and no town has proven too small to be neglected by the canvassers of an enterprising newspaper.
