In the Silence. WE OFFERED thanks to the river For the good that crowned our way; For the blessed peace and the plenty And the promise of coming days; We smiled in the merry circle That leaped about the board, And lifted grateful faces To the heaven we adored. But while gratitude ascended From the lips in laughter curled, Ever in low heart-music, Waited a dirge untold by the world.

For, deep in a heart-room hidden Lived a voice that would not be still And no word of gratitude lifted, But ever did waiting thrill The gloom with its cry of longing For the dear ones gone away, To never come back to the heart-beat On any Thanksgiving Day.

Thanksgiving, the great home holiday, when the home gathering brings together the distant ones and cementing anew the ties of kinship, was very generally observed in this city. It was remarked that more people than ever before went to church on Thanksgiving morning. The spirit of the day seemed to enter into the hearts of the worshippers and to pervade the very atmosphere.

There were many beautiful dinners given in town, chiefly confined to family affairs. There was a brave display of pumpkins and the fruits of the season. A pumpkin center-piece running over with cranberries and purple grapes, while old-time jack-o'-lanterns occupied prominent places.

The Opera-Carnival is the chief topic of conversation. Just at present its destiny seems a trifle mixed with that of professional brethren and sisters, inasmuch as it is through the courtesy of Miss Mildred Holland, of "The Power Behind the Throne" company, that rehearsals are taking place on the Lyceum stage for the amateur performance of Monday night.

The managers of the Hahnemann hospital approached her graceful act and gave evidence of their feeling by sending her beautiful roses yesterday afternoon. Last night Mr. C. H. Welles, of the hospital board, received a pretty note of thanks and a gift of $5 for "standing room" in the hospital, as she quaintly expressed it.
