LIVELY TIME IN SIMPSON.

The Women of That Village Create a Scene in Chasing a Bold Thief, Who Flees, Panic Stricken, to a Justice's Office.

There was a lively scene enacted in the village of Simpson yesterday-the liveliest that has ever been witnessed in that part of the county-when a thief, who failed to make away with his booty, was chased by fully a half hundred of the women of the settlement, until, panie-stricken, he sought refuge in the office of Justice-of-the Lynch, the identical place Peace where the revenge-seeking women sought to round him up.

The luckless individual gave his name as W. Siff, and his residence as Olyphant. What the initial W. meant man refused to divulge, and he wasn't pressed for an answer, as Justice Lynch was impressed that the name he gave was fictitious.

Siff was seen about the village early in the forenoon, acting as if he was trying to locate some person. About room, one of the women of the place rushed from her house and loudly alarmed her nieghbors that her house had been robbed. The stranger was some distance from the observed. house, hurrying along the roadway. The women who were attracted by the wailings of the one whose house was robbed, Mrs. Jacob Copliellis, suspected Siff and with one impulse bounded after him. Siff broke into a run, fellowed by the enraged women, and a chorus of imprecations. Some of the man's pursuers were as fleet of foot as he, and these speedily gained on him. As the pursuit continued the inge of the women grew, and they gave vent to their feelings in loud stricks that drew other women from almost every house until there were fully half a hundred in the chase. Sift was almost paralyzed with fear, and when he neared the office of Justice Lynch he summoned up his courage and hope and flew across the friendly threshold. He dropped into a chair panting and almost exhausted, while the women crowded about gesticulating wildly, their voices uniting in a chorus of threats in their own tongue. The women had due reverence for the justice's court and desisted from laying violent hands on their victim. When they regained their composure, one of the party explained the circumstances of the chase and demanded the return of the stolen property. Siff hadn't all of the booty in his possession, for during the flight and just before he reached Justice Lynch's office, he slackened his speed and turning on his pursuers, hurled a portion of the stolen money at them. Later this portion of the booty was recovered. Siff also gave over a silver watch which he snapped from a chain that langled from the vest in which the timepiece rested. He said nothing about the watch until confronted with the vest and the chain that suspended from the button hole.
