What It Costs to Run the Deutschland.

Samuel A. Wood, in Amble's.

It was printed frequently just after the swift Gunarders came out that they were not paying ships. This was believed by representatives of the German lines, but it is not so.

The sea express, even so mighty a coal consumer as the Deutschland, does pay, and pays well, in the season when traffic is heavy on the Atlantic.

It is estimated that it costs the Hamburg line about $45,000 to run the Deutschland across seas. The largest item of expense is that of coal.

She sends through her four monumental funnels every trip vapor representing $2,000. Then there is the bill for lighting oil, and the cost of the ship's laundry.

In the seasons when the cabins and the steerage are crowded the ships washing usually consists of nearly 24,000 pieces, including table linen, blankets, sheets and the coats of the stewards.

The laundry bills for a single trip vary according to the number of passengers, and range from $200 to $500. There are only two ships in service that their washing aboard—the cruising yacht Prinzessin Victoria Luise and the excursion steamer Auguste Victoria, both of which have electric laundries.

Next to the cost of coal is the expenditure for wages. The boat of the Deutschland's crew of 237 persons, the cost of providing her 700 or more cabin passengers with meals, the wages of the commander, her officers and the chief engineer help to swell the list of expenses.

The command of the German ships receive more pay than those of either the American or British lines. Aside from their regular wages, which range from $1,500 to $4,000 a year, they have a share in the earnings of their ships.

The British lines the captains receive from $1,500 to $6,000 a year, without perquisites. At the end of the year, a British commander's ship has met with no accident, and the British line has a tendency to make commanders more careful.

The pay of the British engineer does not differ materially from those of the engines run without accident. The British line also receives a bonus during the year.
