A FEW ENTERTAINERS OF NEXT SEASON

Distinguished People Who Will Be Brought to Carbondale by the Enterprising Young Men Who Have This Work in Hand-What Can Be Said of Their Entertainers.

The Tribune announced some weeks ago that several of the leading young men of the town's business and social life purposed providing a high-class lecture and entertainment course during the coming entertainment season. It was stated at the time that a treat could be anticipated and this is confirmed by the announcement herewith of some of the entertainers that are certain to appear during the course.

The young men have sought the Brockway Entertainment bureau, which has unmistakably the finest entertainers under its control that are appearing before the American people. Among there may be mentioned Elias Day, the impersonator, whose work has been stamped with the mark of highest approval by scores of branches of th Young Men's Christian association, under whose auspices he has appeared. His work is refined, refreshingly free of caricature or buffoonery, and be makes you laugh or he pleases you by his effort, because he is truly natural and presents characters as you see them about you.

Mare, the magician, is an entertainer who is the acme of eleverness and refinement. He is without a peer in his line, and anybody who doubts this statement can find hundreds in Scranton who will readily refute any contrary statement, for Maro appeared in theatre last season, and there was no greater favorite than he proved him-

The Ernest Gamble Concert company is a musical organization that presents a programme that will surely appeal to the popular taste.

Among the speakers who are being considered are Rev. Thomas Dixon, jr., the former New York city clergyman. who stirred up so much uneasiness among the politicians of Tammany hall during the reform movement of a few years ago. Mr. Dixon is especially at home on civil matters, and his lecture, "The Modern Babylon," is regarded as an extraordinary talk.

Champ Clark, the Missourian, has von such renown as an orator in the last half-dozen years that it is unnecessary to comment on his merits.

John Temple Graves, who Colonel Henry Watterson, himself a celebrated orator, says is "the most eloquent southerner of today," and who, in the opinion of Robert Irving Fulton, "surpasses Ingersoll in rhetoric and delivery," is also among the possibilities of the course. General John B. Gordon, the distinguished southerner, whose leeture. "The Last of the Confederacy," is a rare piece of eloquence and rhetoric. is included in the splendid speakers who will help to provide the contemplated treat for the people of Carbon-

Aleck Copeland, the well-known Delaware and Hudson engineer, and his former fireman, Commodore Sampson, came down from Carbondale yesterday to spend a half-hour in Wilkes-Barre, Aleck is well acquainted with Wilkes-Barre, and feels no sense of insecurity when he visits us, but the commodore so seldom leaves the quaint old town of Carbondale that when he gets into a live, bustling metropolitan municipality of the size and importance of Wilkes-Barre, he is like a little boy attending his first circus.

Aleck and his protege meandered around the square yesterday, continues the News, and strolled down to the Sterling. Sampson had never seen a stream of water larger than Monkey Run at freshet time and he stood transfixed when his eyes fell upon the Susquehanna.

"Gosh!" said Sampson, when he got his breath, "what fer stream is that?" "That," said Aleck, with a mischievous twinkle in his eye, "is the northern arm of Chesapeake bay. Just below the hend there is where they are scooping up clams that are served up in the free lunches and occasionally they send one to Carbondale, where 'Dinny' boils it up and serves it as chowder to the fellows who come in late off the 'Jeff.'

He has a disposition as sunny as the land that he halls from, and everybody has a kind word for little "Nic." It's interesting to note the pride that he maintains in keeping everything neat and tidy about the stand. Every night when the streets are about deserted, "Nic' pitches in to cleaning up the space avenue side, and the way he hustles would put Street Commissioner Killeen's "white wings" to shame. CENTENNIAL SOUVENIR

An Interesting History of Carbondale to Be Published That Will Make a Valuable Souvenir-Further Contributions to General

Fund. Among the interesting features of the semi-centennial celebration is the historical sketch of Carbondale, which will be printed and bound in a style that will make it a valuable souvenir, aside from its historical worth. The aim is to make the history so worthy as to cause it to be cherished and handed from family to family and for years to come. There have been histories and histories of Carbondale, but none has been attempted or carried out as this one. It will be an elaborate work, filled with descriptive detail written in a style to interest and please. There will be numerous halftone cuts of the Carbondale of today and of a half century ago, besides other features.

Among the pictures of most value historically are the "Old Log Tavern," the first house in Carbondale; the big Railway hotel which stood on the corner of Main street and Satem avenue and was a leading hostelry of Northeastern Pennsylvania, alothough incorrectly named, as its palmy days were those when only stage coaches plied to and from this city; the first Trinity church; home of Dr. Rafferty; our first court house; many of the leading residents and officials, of the city fifty years ago, etc., etc. The souvenir will be tastefully gotten up and doubtless will be seized upon with avidity. It is to be published by the semi-centennial association, to add to the glory of the jubilee and perpetuate the leading events in the history of the birthplace of the anthracite industry. #### belongs to North America. NEWSPAPERS AND CRIME.

Harm Done by Yellow Journalism and Its Remedy ..

From the Philadelphia Timese. The mayor of a western city has just appealed to the editors of the newsapers published with the area under his jurisdiction to cease the publication of unnecessary details in regard to suicides. He believes that many are led to take their lives through reading the accounts of how others have acemplished self-destruction and he is entirely right in this conclusion. Psychologists and criminologists have estublished this fact beyond any doubt. Suggestion is a powerful influence to turn the mind into one channel or has been hatched out of brains that have been befuddled by some insidiously written story in a yellow journal The responsibility of newspapers, which is always great, is vastly increased since they are so universally read and since science is able more or less accurately to guage their influence for good or for evil and to saddle editors with their own loads. In several recent instances associations of alienists have discussed the responsibility of the press in reference to insanity, crime, and suicide, always coming to the conclusion that it important and great. A brain which s half-crazed with the troubles and difficulties of life will often have only short way to go to thoughts of suiide. Men whose minds are disordered by want and misfortune are often induced to try highway robbery, burglary and abduction by reading accounts of these things, written up as if they were fine adventures. Murder and all kinds of crime are suggested by newspapers when they are not carefully conducted with an eye to the general public interest. There is a belief among some speculators in the publishing trade that the people want highly embellished accounts of crime. The morgues and police courts are scoured for criminal stories and they are often furnished to the public with picture and phrase that an reader can escape. They exert a wide-reaching and a positively harmfu influence upon the people. But does really want this kind of journalism There is a demand for the news, of course, and this it is the duty of every good newspaper to supply to its readers day by day. It stands as a clearing house between them and the world at large to collect and report such information as they ought to possess. They ought not to want and ought not to have what is harmful to them, and should avoid the papers which make it a business to publish such matter as they would some poisonous pest. That a certain amount of bitter must go along with the sweet is well under-Crime and suicide, when they involve prominent persons and in some way appeal to a legitimate human interest, must be recorded in the newspapers. These things then fall within the field of news, but they should always be treated with dignity and with the sole view of giving the public the necessary facts. Superfluous verbiage and highly colored touches out of the eporter's imagination are unmitigated wils. Stories of crime that bring in people of no consequence and are imply printed to satisfy some prurient and morbid fancy are the curses of the time. Crime doubles itself in this way and the newspaper becomes the chief igency for propagating it. Self-respected people owe it to themselves and to society at large to frown upon this kind of journalism by neither buying nor reading such newspapers. If they hould do this the yellow journal would soon change its color and disappear from the face of the earth. A Model School.
