lowing yesterday's decline, represented the extent to which small traders were willing to commit themselves, and they commenced to buy to cover short contracts and take their profits, if possible. In the absence of any important interest in the market these days today varying fluctuations are all that can be expected.

The policy of what are called the larger interests, pending the developments of new factors, including the settlement of the steel strike, seemed to be pretty clearly defined by these indications. By buying stocks freely during the period of liquidation, they accomplished their purpose of supporting prices. When prices advanced they were willing to sell out the holdings which were taken purely for supporting purposes, but were clearly undisposed to attempt an extensive advance until the situation clears itself. The market is thus left fallow, except for the effectioncy. They secure no following when they bid up prices and they induce no huport and liquidation now when they offer them down. At the close prices were about the lowest of the day. Intimations that the strike settlement negotiations were not going smoothly helped to this end. The closing was thus made weak.
