CATCHING GRASSHOPPERS.

In the Philippines the Natives Use Them for Food.

"One thing I have found out since coming to the Philippines," writes a Kansas boy, "and that is how to catch grasshoppers and prepare them for food. The Filipinos not only make them into pies and cakes, but they pound them into powder and steep them in water, drink it."

There are several methods used by the natives for catching grasshoppers. The most effective is the net. This is a large butterfly net, arranged in a netting placed over a loop and to the latter is fixed a long handle. The native takes this handle and with the mouth of the net toward the grasshoppers, he rushes forth, bugging considerable numbers at a time.

"I never saw a native eat a green grasshopper, but I have seen them eat the dried ones by the pocketful. This is done by the Filipinos, who take considerable delight in picking grasshopper pie before you. Great care is taken in preparing them, so that they do not lose any of their merit."

Silk Growing in the United States.
Whether we shall grow the thing to four million dollars' worth of raw silk which we are now importing depends upon the opening of a factory that at present, says O. P. Austin in Everybody's Magazine, silk has been produced in many of the states, even as far north as New England, and as far south as Florida.

For various reasons, steady lack of experience and the competition of the cheap raw silk of Japan, it has not been a success. The application of science to silk raising as a long-neglected industry may change all this. The number of silk rearing establishments in the United States is increasing every year, thousands of new plants having been established in 1900 alone, and their output now amounts to over one hundred million dollars annually. It is not impossible that American raw silk, supported by American capital may yet find a way of competing with the "barbaric" foreign raw silk, which the latter requires.
