next to the partly figure of Trout Bartley on the bench above. Winston Churchill, having kissed the book, signed his name and shaken hands with the speaker, started off by walking straight to the bench next to that where the ministry sit. There he took his seat calmly by the side of Gibson Bowles and other parliamentary veterans, as though he had sat in the house of commons for several sessions.

All the tricks and mannerisms which are begotten by a long acquaintance with the peculiar usages of the institution appeared to come to him naturally. It takes the new M. P. of the average type some little time, for example, to get accustomed to the habit of wearing his hat in the immediate presence of a bejeweled dignitary like the speaker, or of sitting in a comfortable attitude on the green benches; in short, of feeling at home at once in the historic building which embodies the habit of every member of the house.

Some writers attribute Winston Churchill's early acquisition of the parliamentary manner to the influence of heredity. Already a considerable number of M. P.'s have got into the habit of privately calling him "Young Rands."

A statesman is a man of common opinion, but of uncommon abilities. Winston Churchill has already shown his party a readiness to change one habit of common opinion and the evidence he has displayed to the whole world of abilities of a very uncommon order.

WINSTON CHURCHILL.

Son of a Daughter of Leonard Jerome This Young Man Seems Destined to Surpass His Distinguished Father, Lord Randolph Churchill.

Winston Leonard Spencer-Churchill, M. P., continues to be eulogized. A London print awards the prominent young half-American the following comment headed "The big statesman who has established a parliamentary reputation with rapid speeches."

"Of the many rapid successes to which Winston Churchill can lay claim the most remarkable is his conquest of the house of commons. In the few months he has sat there he has not spoken more than three or four times. In that record space of time, however, he has already established a great parliamentary reputation."

From a parliamentary standpoint the most remarkable feature of his success is the uncommon style in which he has attained it. He has flung conventional methods to the winds, and shown other political aspirants how to win the esteem and attention of the mother of parliaments. The plan commonly adopted by the ambitious M. P. is fairly familiar to the public.

Before you can be recognized as a force in a party you must show a certain independence of judgment, a disposition to be something more than a mere party hack. Elderly and highly respectable politicians, of course, avoid such indiscretions as disobedience to the crack of the party whip. Accordingly they sit behind the front bench of their party above the gangway.

The younger and ambitious men sit below the gangway; that is the quarter which tradition has assigned to them. It was there that the famous fourth party laid the foundations of the greatness which the future had in store for its members; it is there that the irreconcilable Irish Nationalists have sat since they have formed an unwilling part of the house of commons. Below them in the same quarter sit Sir Charles Diller, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Lloyd-George and the other forces who have to be reckoned with in Liberalism. Opposite to them, below the ministerial gangway, Mr. "Jimmy" Lowther (the protectionist champion), Lord Hugh Cecil, Mr. T. W. Russell and other candid friends of the government sit in critical watchfulness, ready to keep the heads of their party up to the mark. It may be accepted as a parliamentary axiom that the surest road to the front bench is by way of the seats below the gangway. It is the recognized spot for exciting the attention of parliament.

On the opening day of the session, when Mr. Churchill's chubby face imparted a solitary suggestion of youth to the group of elderly M. P.'s who were being sworn in at the same time, some curiosity was evinced as to where he would sit. Every one felt instinctively it would be below the gangway; the uncertainty was as to whether it would be below the gangway or below the ministerial gangway.

ally relieved the congestion, says the Baltimore "Sun." The old underground railroad are paying only 3 per cent, though they are choked with traffic at the "rush" hours.

Vested interests are declared to be too strong to permit the laying of surface trolley lines in the centers of London. Mr. Balfour suggests the use of cycles and motors only is practicable, but it would cost $100,000,000 or more to condemn private property for that purpose. The widening of the existing main roads would be even more costly.

The problem of the slums and the overcrowded tenements seems to be even more acute in London than in New York. Rents are so high, owing to the lack of quick transit to the suburbs, that the working people are driven to form new slum settlements as fast as the old ones are torn down. And the county council's model tenements, built with the taxpayers' money are declared to be let at rentals that do not pay for the investment.

As to its water supply, London, says the reviewer, cannot much longer rely upon the Thames, which "in a dry summer below Teddington Weir is little better than a mud-colored gutter." All of her nearby sources of water have been appropriated. The nearest one available is in South Wales, and the Welsh people strenuously object to parting with it. From these premises the reviewer's conclusion is that London has about reached its utmost possible size and must soon stop growing. Perhaps in all countries, including our own, Thomas Jefferson's opinion that the growth of great cities was not favorable to the best conditions of living will finally stand approved by experience.

RASPBERRY CUP.

Directions for Preparing What Is an Ideal Summer Drink.

From the New York Commercial Advertiser.

Raspberry cup is an ideal drink on a hot summer afternoon. Take a pound and a half of ripe, fresh raspberries, mash them with a wooden spoon in a basin. Then add a pint and a half of cold water, the juice of two lemons, a few drops of rosewater, and a half pound of sugar loaf. Let this mixture stand for three or four hours, and stir at intervals, so as to be sure the fruit is thoroughly well mashed; then strain through muslin. If convenient keep it on ice until wanted, and just before serving add two bottles of soda water, a lump of ice and when it is in the bowl or jug float a few rose leaves on top.

Some raspberries are much fuller flavored than others, then either more water or soda water may be added and it may also require little more sugar, which must be stirred until dissolved. Ingredients, one and a half pounds berries, one and a half pints water, two lemons, a few drops rosewater, one-half pound loaf sugar, two bottles soda water, ice and six or eight fresh rose leaves.

The Newest Photographic Album.

The microscope seems bound to take the place of the family photograph album; for, instead of one stiffened photograph, we have a succession of a thousand, each taken within half a minute, of the same subject. Hence, no more placid, angular effects, but a delightful series of views recording every phase and shade of the subject's expression. And the original negative is made, as many microscope users can be printed from as desired. Instead of exchanging one-plate photographs with one's friends, the possessor of a parlor microscope sends a life-motion picture of himself, of his family, of his pet, to his friends or relatives—Everybody's Magazine.
