SUPERINTENDENT GARR WAS INEXORABLE

Refused to Alter His Decision to the Board Made Suppliant Appeals to Him - Details of the Conference.

on Saturday evening reiterated his re- heartiest congratulations and best fusal to allow the privilege of a re- wishes over the nuptial event. examination to the substitute teachers and others who failed to pass the re- Carbondale high school and for sevcent examination as candidates for eral years has been one of the most positions in the city schools.

Mr. Garr gave his refusal to three school teachers, members of the Carbondale school President Hughes, Secretary Kerwin and Director Gallagher, at a conference which was held for the purpose of an understanding as to the seeming conflict of the superintendent with the wishes of the board, in this Tribune last week, Mr. Garr notified there would be no re-examination. As was untenanted, though there was also pointed out, the board at one of its meetings prior to this requested the superintendent to allow a re-examination, and expected Mr. Garr to When Chief McNulty investigated the concur in its wishes. This the superintendent was not disposed to do. Judging from his communication to the unsuccessful teacher referred to, and it was to ascertain the why and wherefore of his refusal that the three directors, Messrs. Hughes, Kerwin and insurance, Gallagher, met with him on Saturday

The meeting was truly out of the ordinary and in striking contrast with Carbondale Young Ladies Entertainthe usual position of the directors, who, given such wide discretion under the law, transact their business withfear of encountering a snag. In this instance it was different. Here was a notable exception, for in Superintendent Garr's steadfast refusal they did meet with a stumbling block which, try as they could, the trio were not able to pass safely. The three directors argued with Mr. Garr, they urged suggestion after suggestion upon him. then they took the singular position, as school directors, of fairly pleading with him of making a supplement appeal, it can be said, for another chance the unsuccessful teachers. But Mr. Garr was unmoved. He persisted in his refusal, and in emphasizing his reasons for the position he had taken, he displayed that firmness of purpose which, as called attention to in The Tribune, he is known to possess wherein he believes he is right. Like the laws of the Medes and Persians, which once made known, are altered not, Mr. Garr's decision was not to shaken by the wind and was not to be changed by the arguments of the energetic directors, who exhausted all of age in favor of the unsuccessful class.

The position taken by Mr. Garr was that he declared before the examinations took place that there would be no re-examination. Having made this decision, after considering all the circumstances, he would be unfair to him self and would not be consistent if he was to alter this decison.

The directors pointed out to Mr Garr that the first year he was in office he allowed a re-examination for those who failed, and that a spirit of fairness should move him to grant the same privilege to those who were unsuccessful this year. Mr. Garr admitted the truth of the statement that he allowed a second examination the first year, but in explanation said it was due to the circumstance that he was a stranger, as it were to the teachers that they were unacquainted with him and his methods, and were consequently nervous and apprehensive. Taking this into account, he was not averse to a second examination, and Thomas Gardner, of Toledo, O. Games, was even anxious that the teachers music and refreshments were enjoyed would not suffer on this account. armed, he saw no good and just reason why he should after his decision

The directors met the latter part of Mr. Garr's answering by averring that they had absolutely no knowledge of his intention to admit of no re-examination. It was news to them to learn this from him, and they implied a rebuke for his not having informed them of his purpose. It was suggested that the withholding of his intention was the means of placing the board in a peculiar position before the public, and that if the directors were rightly informed the request for another examination would likely not have been made. Finally the discussion narrowed down to an appeal, the directors promising that if their request be granted this time, appreciating the position of Mr. Garr in the matter, they would not again ask the favor, such as it now ame about to be

Through all this. Mr. Garr could not see but that he was right, and even in the light of heeding the appeal of the directors who pleaded with him, he could not be persuaded to recall his decision.

The directors left the meeting with Mr. Garr greatly chagrined, and some of them, if not all, with their feelings under high pressure. There was no oncealment of the disappointment that was experienced, and it is only the truth to state that more than one aloric opinion has been expressed over the result, or rather the lack of it, of the meeting.

ut of them for one dollar. Want them? Certainly, she did not ant them, but how else were they be saved? She also knew how far dollar should be made to last, but pity came uppermost. Without a word she handed the man a silver dollar; he laid the bag at her feet and, with great rapidity, disappeared.

Now another question presented itself. What was to be done with the rescued pupples? Her load seemed to increase in weight; she soon learned that the bag also contained a large stone. With difficulty she reached the corner of the street and stopped for Suddenly a crowd dashed around the orner. They were pursuing a dog that ran before all; its head down jaws snapping, and bleeding from the

Some one started forward and, with he cry of "Mad dog!" pushed her viontly aside. The crowd passed on:; the cries of the tortured mad dog were heard above the din. end she could again see the dog plainly. His pursuers were fast gaining: one leg hung limp, its mouth was white with foam, and the body was covered with many wounds. "A pistol shot rang out on the sultry air. With a prolonged howl of pain the dog sank to the ground and all was over, A low whine at her feet frightened her back to her senses. She had no moved from the place where her resouer had pushed her. The bag was still clutched tightly in her fingers, and it was from this that the whine Slowly she started on-then stopped. Somehow her mind and eyes seemed to turn to the crowd still in the street. Again she started with the same result, only that her eyes would travel from the crowd back to the bag in her hand. Why should she connect them with each other? The dogs she held were not mad. Once more her eyes turned to the bag and remained there. Pily was written in every feature. Perhaps it was com-

Truly some conflict was taking place in her mind. Her lip quivered, her eyes filled; but the bright light in them did not fade. Quickly she raised her head and said aloud to herself; 'If that's the life of a dog, then death

She looked for the man from whom she had made her purchase, but oblivion had long claimed him. With firm step she walked quickly to the end of the pier. Grasping the bag in her hands, and holding it out at arms' length, she closed her eyes and the bag fell with a thud-on the boards at her feet.

Seizine a pen knife from her purse. she cut the cord around the mouth of the sack. Nothing but deep joy gleamed in her eyes as she went her way.
