lie Church of St. Anthony of Padua Commemorate the Saint's Festival with a Procession and Picnic-Large Statue of the Saint Borne Through the Streets of the Italian Colony by . Vested Men, Preceded by the Priest.

In accordance with an established custom in all the cities and towns of Italy, a special celebration in honor of Italy's favorite saint, St. Anthony o Padua, was conducted yesterday in the Italian colony in Dunmore.

The streets of the Italian colony were thronged with people early in the afternoon. The larger number of these were Italians from all parts of this city and county, though there were many others drawn to the scene out of idle curiosity. The little church of St. Anthony, perched on a high hill, was the place of rendezvous for those who desired to see the start of the procession, which began to move about 3.30 o'clock. First in line were a number of white-velled little girls, carrying candles. Following them came a group of acolytes. Then came the statue of St. Anthony, borne on the shoulders of four men and Italians from all parts of this city and protected from the sun by a canopy, carried by four others. These bearers were all Italians chosen from among the rank and file of the colony, strong, robust men, deeply serious about what they were doing, even if some of them were a bit rough-looking. They all wore long white cassocks with curlous little capes and sashes of azure blue.

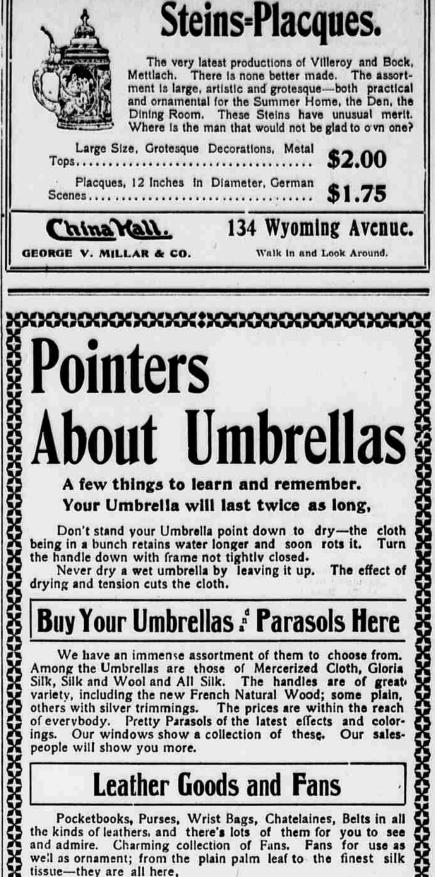

STATUE CARRIED ABOUT.

The statue of the saint which is carried in these yearly processions is, frankly speaking, not a work of fine art. It was carved out of wood many years ago by an Italian who lived in those parts, and though a new and more life-like one has been purchased the people refuse to permit its use. Directly in front of the statue walked Rev. Father Joseph, the pustor of the church, robed in a white vestment and carrying a relic of St. Anthony encased in a golden box. At his side walked an acolyte, bearing a lighted consor and behind the statue marched the Roma hand, playing a slow and measured march. As the procession moved along the street, all the men uncovered and many knelt. On every side could be seen women kneeling on the ground and beating their breasts with their clenched right hands, giving voice to low-toned lamentations the while.

In front of many of the houses gaily decorated tables were placed, and when one of these was reached the bearers placed the statue upon it and the priest recited a brief prayer, blessing the house. Then the relic was lifted up and swung to the four corners of heaven. A gift in the form of money was generally received when a stop was made, some member of the househeld pinning a bill or bills to the saint's robe.

As the procession passed along, grew longer and longer, for behind the hand there fell in an assemblage of devout Italians, who marched over the dusty roads until 6 o'clock and after. There were young men and old men, who hobbled along with canes; young
