DUNMORE.

The school board held a special meeting last evening, with Mr. Murray the only absentee. An exhaustive report was read, showing the financial doings of the board during the past several years, which was compiled under the direction of the finance committee. The report shows the net debt of the district on June 2, 1902, to have been $43.-224.60, about $30,000 of which is outstanding orders for the years 1898, 1899, 1900 and 1901, on which six per cent. interest is being paid. It was decided that the report be published in namphlet form and distributed throughout the town. The attorney was instructed to endeavor to make an amicable settlement of the questions in dispute between the board and ex-Treasurer Enble, if possible, and if not to take legal action. In the matter of treasurer's commission, it was decided to have a case stated brought before the court for a decision as to whether one per cent or two per cent. is the legal rate. The board decided to issue twenty year four per cent. bonds to the amount of $55,000, to be used in redeeming old issues of five per cent. bonds and also outstanding orders and provide for a tax of three mills, to pay interest and redeem same. That Is What Language Is When You Analyze It.

leo. L. Kittredge in Harper's Magazine.

The overwhelming conventionality of language, as well as its poetic quality, may be seen by taking at random almost any bit of colorless prose and studying its derivations. We shall find it a conglomerate of worn-out meta-We all talk poetry without phors. knowing it, and mix our figures without scruple. Take, for instance, the phrase "arguments founded on correct derivation." Argument comes from a Latin verb that means literally "to make clear," and is ultimately referable to a root signifying "bright." 'shining"-the same that we have in argent, "silver" (the bright or shining metal). Found is connected with the Latin fundus, "bottom." Correct goes back to a root which means "straight." Derivation is connected with rivus. 'brook," "stream," and comes from a oot signifying to "flow"; to derive is literally to "flow from such and such a source." Thus in this single phrase we have effete metaphors of brightness, foundation, straightness, and flowing. It would sound absurd to speak of "a clearing-up that has its foundation on straightened down-flowing"; yet we say "arguments founded on correct derivation" without a tremor, merely beause our language has forgotten the figurative character of the words, and employs them as conventional signs for olain prosaic idens. To convince is literally to conquer; to defend is to ward off, to shove away; to amputate is to prune round (a vine); to solve is to loose; to deter is to scare away; to debate is to fight it out; to respect is to look back; to discuss is to shake apart: to distract is to tear or drag asunder or away. stances means literally "things that stand around one," yet "under these circumstances," and we even say "under the following circumstances" without hesitation. Language cannot get along without such vague words, which have lost all their sharpness of imprint, and serve rather as counters of the game than as coin of definite value
