Like the tragedian who sighs for comic roles and the comedian who envies the lot of the tragedian, Miss Fischer had always a strong prediliction for comedy impersonations and whenever assigned one demonstrated her aptitude in that line of endeavor. Miss Furniss convinced that were the right vehicle provided for Miss Fischer she would at once take her position in the foremost ranks of comediennes. This conviction had noticed her skill in comedy. The Wild Rose.

It is the aim of all musical composers who devote their efforts to the compositions of that present day most popular style of entertainment classified as mu-sical gaities, to write one particular number with a view of making it the "whistsponsible for George W. Lederer's latest successful "gaiety." "The Wild Rose," which comes to the Lyceum Friday has struck the right chord in "The Little Gypsy Maid," sung by Irene Bentley in that production.

She does not come down to the footlights and throw it at the audience, but sits under a tree at one side of the stage and languidly croons the graceful air. It is in a gypsy camp in a wood that seems infested with drowsiness. In an apparently chance spot, a swarthy-skinned lad emerges from a brokendown wagon, and, sitting on its steps whittles a stick while he sings the refrain and the gypsy girl lies back with closed eyes. When he has finished he slides back into the wagon as though unsuspicious of

"A New York Girl."

Manager Herrington, of the Star, presents for his Thanksgiving attraction, "A New York Girl" company. The cast contains the names of many well known clever people, and a large chorus of twenty pretty girls. "Frolicsome Flo Flyaway" is the character portrayed by the eleverest woman in burlesque, viz: Eulalie, and this dainty chie comedienne has no rival in this particular line. The stage settings, costumes and scenery are truly resplendent. The large chorus of handsome young ladies contribute in no small way toward making the entertainment a success, and it is a combination which deserves patronage by ail.
