PITTSBURGH GAZETTE.

OUTWARD BOUND.

The day has past, and evening grey
Fades o'er the murmuring sea—
Our white winged vessel glides away,
From love, and home, and thee—
Unconscious that our tearful eyes
Still watch the lessening shore,
Like a wild sea bird on she flies,
To climes unseen before.

When murky, troubling thoughts have press'd
The drooping heart with dread,
I'll watch yon moon, whose beauty bless'd
The trysting hours long fled.
But many a moon as bright as this,
Its star-lit path will roam,
Ere I return—again to kiss
The prayerful lips at home.

From the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

The Drunkard.

Of all the objects of misery and crime, in which fallen humanity has been steeped, none seem to strike the observer with more horror and astonishment than the habitual drunkard. He exhibits one of the most loathsome yet pitiable spectacles the eye of man has ever been called upon to witness.. And when the final judgment shall come, and the great Judge of all shall decide the eternal destinies of an assembled world, I imagine, amid the multiplicity of sins which shall rise up as witnesses against guilty man, none will meet with less indulgence in the sight of a righteous God than the sin of the character under consideration. The drunkard is a curse to himself, a curse to society, and accursed in the sight of God. 'First, to himself, and what an appalling scene to behold a being endowed with an immortal principle, originally created in the image of God, and destined to an eternal state of existence beyond the grave, thus to pervert the object of his creation, in debasing himself in degradation below the brute creation! The evils attendant on the drunkard may be considered of a twofold nature, destruction of life and property. Who ever heard of a healthy or a wealthy drunkard? It is impossible! His inevitable destiny is an immature death, involved in penury and want. Death never wielded a surer instrument of destruction than the drunkard employs for his own ruin. If we could unroll the records of mortality, how many millions would we find occupying the drunkard's grave, unpitied, unwept, and uncared for. He is ushered into the realities of eternity, murdered by his own hand. His property is all squandered, (and how often does it fall into that wretch's hand who has so lavishly supplied him with the liquid poison which has thus early destroyed his life,) and then he is left to drag out his miserable existence in some dilapidated hovel, clothed in filthy rags, and starving for food. Yet if you approach the character in question, and tell him of his future end, he will meet you with curses, and treat you with scorn; for the means he is using is deceitful in its pampering, yet fatal in its effects. Secondly, he is a curse to society. Man was not created for himself alone, but rather for the good of others. He has a higher motive to prompt him to action than the subserving his own selfish ends. Consequently he occupies a responsible station in the society with which he is surrounded; yet how can a man perform his duties in life by visiting haunts of debauchery, as a drunkard? Let us view him in a family circle. He is there surrounded by those whom he has plighted before heaven and earth to support and protect. Yet see him forsake that happy group, composed, perhaps, of an affectionate wife and dependent offspring, to seek the haunts of revelry—a confirmed drunkard—there to spend his time and effects, which should be appropriated to the comfort and happiness of his once-happy but now dejected family. While we thus view him, immerged in revelry and hilarity, surrounded by his companions in sin—perhaps uttering oaths and curses of the most horrid kind—let us return to those sainted ones whom he has left at home, eagerly looking for his return. That wife, whose countenance once lit with smiles as she joyously surveyed the husband of her choice; and that group of happy innocents, whose faces once beamed with joy as they received the caresses of their dear father, have now become dejected and downcast. She who once was the glad partner of his life, mayhap, after dragging out a few years of a wretched existence, at length breathes out her weary life amid the weeping of her squalid off spring, strangely commingling with the blasphemy of her demoniac husband. The mother is now gone, and that bloated husband will soon follow, leaving the helpless orphans a mercy to an unfeeling world, to buffet their way over the rough sea of life, with neither pilot nor helmsman.

This constitutes but one of the prominent evils attendant on the drunkard's career. It is not all. He is not capacitated to fill any station in public life which his fellow men might impose upon him, or which his otherwise brilliant talents might solicit. He has degraded himself beneath their respect or attention, and they shun him as some noxious creature. His mind however great it may have been, is now a complete wreck; in all probability, reason has forsook its throne, and the maniac shriek is all that now reminds us of a once lofty and godlike mind. How frequently, like an incarnate fiend, does the maddened, phrenzied drunkard rush, heedless of consequences, into direful scenes of crime, for which an eternity of expiation can never atone for! To use the language of another, "How often does the drunken revel end in the cry of murder!" We venture to say the major part of all the murders committed in our midst are perpetrated by this character. He alone, when intoxicated by the soul-destroying influence of ardent spirits, is ready to steep his hands in any crime, however dreadful.

Thirdly: We will consider him accursed before God. Mankind are answerable before a higher tribunal than any earthly court, for the deeds done in the body. And how can a man who has been an emissary of the devil, expect to receive the approbation of a holy God, who "cannot look upon sin with the least degree of allowance," and who has imperatively declared that no drunkard "shall enter the kingdom of God?" If, we could unveil the regions of the damned, and descry the unhappy inmates of that place "where the worm dieth not," I fancy among all the spirits lost who inhabit that doleful country, I see the drunkard writhing under the excruciating torture inflicted in the nether, most boundary of the pit of destruction; and all this for the transgression of the known laws of heaven.

NEW YORK ADVERTISEMENTS.

HENRY WATERMAN'S PATENT HAMMERED SAWS—The subscriber would call the attention of dealers, and others, to this superior article, by his patent process of hammering, the saw is more thoroughly tempered than it can be by any other method. It is well known to machinists that the surface of cast steel is the hardest part. Where saws are tempered according to the usual method and hammered by hand, it is necessary to polish them, thereby grinding off the most serviceable part of the saw. These saws are not polished, and only require a trial to be appreciated. They have already been put to the severest test in some of the largest saw mills in this vicinity, and pronounced unequalled. We are now prepared to execute orders for all sizes of Mill, Pit and Circular Saws.
