back to a long time before the Reformation, to the time in fact when digion of clistation was formed under the inspiration of Catholicity.

How is this met? It is remarkable that no offert has been made by those who opposed me to show that they resulted from or were not anterior to the Reformation. It is not admitted the rights of his subjects, and the single object of the barons was to get from him a charter, or constitution if you please, to reptore those rights we received them from England, and that they existed before the change of religion in the sixteenth century.

Some of those who opposed me for going so are back, have since admitted the main features ar oach, asset since similated the main teaches If our Constitution to be all of British origin The British Constitution," says the Pundurgh Fasette of last Monday, "had as real an exist-

The conclusion to which the Bishop comes, in gaze of men, after having lain hid beneath the rubbish of eighteen centuries. The Reformation originated nothing; it was a resurrection, not a creation; old truths were brought to light, not new ones revealed from Heaves. The simple and sublime truths which fell from the sips of Christ and his apostles had long been marred, obscured, and at length almost buried out of loss both on earth and in heaven could launch
The cabinet fermit sight by vain, traditions and buman inventious was the work of the reformers to clear away the accumulated rubbish of a thousand years, to give free course to the Word of God, and restore the direct and immediate commu-gion of man with his Maker. In our former article we showed from history that we first find the fundamental principles of British polity and jurisprudence in the reign of Portion porty and jurisproaches in the reign of Alfred; and that we can trace them down, with more or less distinctness, to the time of John. We gave a brief sketch of the quarrel between games of the one and the obstinacy of the other; of the final submission of that abject monarch to the Pontiff and of the propositional support der of the Kingdom of England to the latter, both spiritually and temporally. We then rehearsed briefly the struggle of the barons and people of England against the encreachments of

Look at the paragraph beginning "I am not now either impugning or defending," &c. Can any thing be more disingunous? What are we to think of a man who, in defense of a mere once in the American Colonies as in the British | temporal claim, will adjudge and sentence mer enoe in the American Colonies as in the British Isles. The great prinples of which it is composed were here assiduously cherished long before the Colonies thought of separating from the moniew thing, but simply an embodiment and still following the colonies thought of the same principles which for aget had been growing up among the Anglo Saxon branch of the human family. This is carrying them back, almost in my words, to a Catholic origin.

The Bishop affects to be surprised that we have not endeavored to show that our civil institu Pope proves, beyond all cavil or contrasiction, that the very genius of Catholicity is inimical to
