PITTSBURGH GAZETTE.

The Illicitly Husband.

BY MRS. TAYLOR.

Wedded ere I reached the twenties,
Ere the child I loved the best,
Young, Unloved, merry hearted,
Who shall say I am not blest.

With the little may not be perfect,
Little pleasure ofte cruel has,
Be the fact that my dear husband
Is a literary man.

You may hear the poet rabid
Shining in his narrow dress,
Known exhaustingly about him,
With no thought of cleanliness.

By the state of wild disorder
Which his hair is always in—
By the fact that dog eared collars
Curling 'round his unshaved chin.

By the fat upon his fingers,
And his dark and dismal stains
Seen upon the table covers,
Spots of all my care and pains.

By the thousand like attrictions
Which the poet's gift confers,
You may see that he is numbered
With the divine worshippers.

I must speak in smothered whispers,
And my tiptoes move around,
Lest I scare his dainty fancies
By some rude and jarring sound.

Apt to draw his rapt attention
From his pen I vainly cry,
And my kindly wordful question
Meets some foreign, strange reply.

Words thin thin, and more perplexing—
Though he is the best of men—
He, of late, has really fancied
That I, too, might wield the pen.

That I, too, must spend long hours
Daily o'er a sheet of post,
Rubbing my bewildered forehead,
Counting fickle Pegasus's host.

And if I attempt employment
While he pens romantic love,
He, by his self-satisfied manner,
Shows his feelings above.

Till I, willing to turn beside him,
Just to please his ambitious aim:
Weave long rhymes and rambling sketches,
Rather on the poorer plan.

Till my head is aching sadly,
And my fingers stained with ink—
Ah, authors and printers
Are quite puzzled what to think.

Ah, I should be really happy,
If my husband were but a man,
In a fact that my dear husband
Is a literary man.
