PITTSBURGH GAZETTE.
FRIDAY MORNING, OCT. 29, 1852.

The Buffalo Commercial, speaking of the collision of the Ocean and the Minnehaha on the Lakes, says that the report that the accident to the steamer Ocean was occasioned by the breaking of the shaft of the boat, was an error. The Ocean was run into by the schooner Mansfield, and it is truly wonderful that a calamity somewhat similar to that of the loss of the Atlantic grew out the result. The Ocean, it appears, was near Long Point, and about four miles from the spot where the wreck of the Atlantic now lies, when she discovered the schooner Mansfield bearing down upon her at the rate of about six or seven miles per hour. The steamer's helm was put hard aport, and she was turned nearly round on her keel. The schooner came into her on the forward part of the wheel, cutting through into the steamer's kitchen, and leaving the figure head of the schooner on the the steamer's deck. The schooner struck the Ocean ten feet fore or aft of this spot, the boat would have gone down with her full load of passengers, and the land would again have been plunged into mourning.

We learn from the Scientific American that Joseph Sawyer, of the City of Boston, Mass., has taken measures to secure a patent for an improved machine for sweeping streets. Three broom wheels are attached to a carriage, two being placed at the front and one at the back part. The front brush wheels are placed horizontally under the carriage, one at each side, and the third wheel behind. These wheels sweep the dirt into the center underneath the machine, and at intervals they are made to rise and step, as it were, over the heap of dirt gathered to the centre. The bright wheel on the back of the machine is vertical, and is placed on a line to the central heaps of dirt, and sweeps them up as the machine moves along up a short inclined shute into a proper receptacle. The work of sweeping the dirt into heaps, and up into the receptacle, is carried on until there is a full load in the receptacle.
