HOME MATTERS.

SECOND DAY.

WEDNESDAY, Dec. 8, 1851.

The Court of Oyer and Terminer assembled at the usual hour, and proceeded with the trial of Jewell.

The Counsel for defence called the following witnesses:

Dr. Dilworth recalled—Mitchell was not bloody when I saw him; from the nature of the wound it would bleed altogether internally; the death was caused by internal injuries altogether; thought the man was a good deal better, seeing that he was lying down.

Cross examined—Noticed no blood on Mitchell's shirt; the wound might have caused blood on the knife.

Wm. B. Mowry sworn—Was Surveyor of the port of Pittsburgh; the water in the river was low last summer in July; it is about 400 feet from a boat lying at the wharf to Spang's warehouse; there is considerable elevation from where the boats lie to the warehouse; the difference between Sahl's tavern and Hutchinson's is about fifty feet.

Cross examined—Did not know the stage of water on the 5th of July last.

James Carnahan recalled—On the 5th of July last saw Jewell early in the morning; about 9 o'clock went out with him to Turtle Creek, and staid until 2 o'clock; when we came in he was considerably intoxicated, but not so far drunk when we came in. We went to Laverty's and drank three or four times, and afterwards drank at Wilkins Hall, once. At the time of the occurrence he was pretty drunk; he was pretty drunk at that time, he fell on his knee when we started to run; I never saw Mitchell before: Cochran pointed him out and I then was accused of picking a man's pocket, and slided in the mud; Jewell drank brandy during the day; there was a plug nick on the bill, and we were around there occasionally; we met Gaw at Laverty's, and he took us to Wilkins Hall to treat us: we all happened to be pretty near together, and we just happened to meet in the morning, and walked round; it is so long ago that I don't recollect what Jewell said when Gaw proposed going to Wilkins Hall; John Jones was with us at Laverty's; he and Gaw were there when we came; I don't know what became of McMullin; he was engaged in the quarrel; I saw him bend down over the man; I didn't see any knife used on the occasion; they all left about the same time; Cochran was the last to leave; he went with Jewell.

George M'Gonigle, sworn—Know that Jewell is left-handed.

Cross examined—I do not mean to say that he could not use his right hand.

Officer Reed, sworn—I know Jewell; I assisted in arresting him; I would say he had been drinking that day; I didn't go into the room where he was locked up; I crossed through two yards and one fence before I got to Jewell, on Cherry alley; he is left handed.

Col. J. Herron Foster, sworn—I saw David Jewell; night of his arrest, in the Watch House; I don't recollect what time it was; it was after dark; thought he had been intoxicated—either drunk then, or just getting over it; he was complaining a great deal about the wound on the head; the physician sent for did not come; there was a good deal of blood on the head, though I did not see more than one wound.

Cross examined—Don't say what time it was when I saw him in the cell.

Dr. Gallagher, sworn—I have seen Jewell several times intoxicated, and I noticed it made him reckless of consequences attending his acts. It produced a derangement of the nerves; drunkenness makes a great alteration in him.

David Jewell, Jr., sworn—My son has been left-handed from a child; had great difficulty in getting him to use his right hand in writing; in manual labor he used his left hand; he has a wife and one child. Although I have heard of Jewell drunk, and have seen him with a great deal of liquor in him, I never saw him so much staggering; he is wild when he is drunk; I mean, deranged. At that time, I was at Pomeroy, Ohio, 220 miles from here; on the 6th, I received a telegraphic despatch about the occurrence; I started home immediately, and arrived on the 8th; the water in the channel was less than three feet deep.

By the Commonwealth—James Barr, sworn, came along the wharf immediately after the murder; I had come up the river in the Paul Anderson; I think there was six feet water in the channel at that time; the first-class boats were running; there had been a rise in the river on the 4th.

Here the testimony on defence ended.

District Attorney Flannegin commenced his address to the jury in behalf of the Commonwealth, by a full exposition of the law relating to the different degrees of homicide. He then reviewed the ground taken by the defence, and compared them by reference to the testimony given on the part of the commonwealth. In relation to the question as to whether the prisoner was intoxicated at the time of the commission of the crime for which he is indicted, he alleged that Jewell's conversation with Cochran at the Monongahela House, proved conclusively, that he had full possession of his faculties. The law only regarded intoxication as an excuse, when the will is completely taken away by it. Was this the case with Jewell? Jewell said to Cochran that before he would go any further, he must need to understand all about the difficulty. He did not want to go down and be involved in a fight. He would only go on condition that Cochran would reason calmly with the man. Did not that show conclusively, that Jewell was not under the influence of liquor to a sufficient extent, to give him the benefit of the law on that point?

The gentleman occupied about three quarters of an hour in the delivery of his very masterly and learned address, and evidently made a deep impression upon the minds of the audience.

Hon. Cornelius Darragh, one of the Attorneys for the defence, made an eloquent and beautiful address to the jury in behalf of his client. He was followed by Hon. Charles Shaler, who made a very effective speech. D. D. Bruce, Esq., closed for the Commonwealth, in a very powerful argument, which was listened to with profound attention.

The length of our report to-day, compells us to omit sketches of these eloquent speeches, much to our regret.]

Judge Mellvaine then proceeded to charge the Jury.

His Honor premised that the case before them was one of the most solemn nature upon which Courts and Juries were called upon to act. It was always a heavy responsibility for a Court to charge a jury in a case like this, and his duties were increased in this trial from the fact of the very able and distinguished Counsel who have been engaged for the defence, surpassed by none in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. It will be necessary to charge the jury more at length in this case than in others from that fact. The Counsel both for the prosecution and defence has discharged their duty, and well.

There were two duties to be discharged—one by himself, and the other by the Gentlemen of the Jury. They should see that they discharged them as they ought. The Gentleman of the Jury are sworn to try this case, and a verdict return according to the evidence, not according to the penalty; that was his duty, with the penalty that follows a verdict of Murder in the first degree they had nothing to do, and if it entered into their deliberations they violated their oath. To find a low grade of crime because of the nature of the penalty, is for a jury to wrest from the hands of the Governor the prerogative of pardon given him by the Constitution. The jury has no such right, and the Court has no such right. Now the gentlemen were to find a verdict according to the law and the evidence. If the evidence be clear in a case of a trial of murder in the first degree, they must return such a verdict. For murder in the first degree they cannot find a verdict of manslaughter by way of compromise of penalty. Their oath will no permit them to do so. No man dare do so. They might as well compromise by finding a verdict of guilty of petty larceny, or of keeping a tipling house, cases with which the evidence had nothing to do. If the 1st murder in the 1st Degree, let their verdict be guilty of murder in the first degree; if it be murder in the second degree, let their verdict be so; if manslaughter, let the verdict be manslaughter. The Gentlemen of the Jury owed a duty here; the Court owed a duty to the prisoner. But it is but one half of their duty. Both they and himself owed a duty to the Commonwealth, and that must be discharged. Society has surrendered its original savage right to take away life, and Courts and Juries are the depositaries of the legal power to try cases involving life or death, and to find according to the evidence. If an innocent man is convicted, the jury have violated their duty—if a guilty one escapes, they have equally violated their duty. They are the agents under the law. If Courts and Juries prove feeble and weak and cannot protect society, society, becoming disgusted, will seize the power from them, and the lamp posts at every corner will be used for gallows. They should see that they do not neglect the sacred and solemn duty, either for the love of mortion, or sympathy, in his, or the friends of the Jury.

But if an innocent person should be convicted of a crime, he has recourse to the Supreme Court, who can reverse the decision. That was a benefit that redounds to the good of the prisoner. But if a guilty one is acquitted, no power on earth could convict him. Each person acquitted, if guilty, cheapens the life of every man, woman and child in the community. These remarks were of a general nature. These were some of the duties of the Court and Jury. They have each, separately and distinctly, stated that they had formed no opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner; and neither they had. Their opinion must be formed from the evidence from the lips of the witnesses. The learned gentleman, Mr. Darragh, referred in his address to the influence of public opinion. His Honor cared not what public opinion was out of doors, or elsewhere. Public opinion had never risen against this desk or the box, but if it does, it will strike a rock, that will roll it back, broken and rebuked. But, if a butchery is committed in the streets, the public will know it. If a person took hold of a pair of hot pincers, his flesh would be burned. Blood would follow the knife that thrust to the heart, and if society received a rude shock, its nerves would shudder. If the Press did not report these things it would be derelict to its duty, and unfit for the high place it occupies.

He would not refer at length to the evidence given, for two reasons. 1st, The evidence in behalf of the Commonwealth was uncontradicted. 2nd, Because the learned and distinguished counsel for the defence, as the Jury must have remarked, did not undertake to do away with the credibility of the witnesses examined. The testimony remains uncontradicted—unqualified by the learned counsel. He would take no notice of the parties engaged in the affray. He would examine the evidence, and not all of that, relating to the prisoner. By law and testimony let him be judged. The Commonwealth, in this and in every other case, would be always pleased to see evidence that would acquit rather than convict a prisoner.

David Jewell, on the afternoon of the 5th of July, with other persons to the jury well known, left Wilkins Hall and proceeded in search of the man Mitchell. The mate of the steamboat Julia Dean saw these four men meet Mitchell, and then he heard the cry of "murder." Who indicted the murderous blow? That the man was butchered with a knife was too plain for comment. But, whose act was it? The mate of the boat saw the man in the blue coat strike an underhanded blow. Jewell then came up street, and went into Felix Laverty's tavern, on Smithfield street. Officer Dougherty was in hot pursuit. Jewell, with the quick perception of a criminal, as soon as he saw him, takes refuge in the cellar. He emerged from the cellar on Smithfield street, and took to his heels. Dougherty pursued and overtook him. Jewell drew a pistol, loaded almost to the mouth, presented it at Dougherty, and snapped it within killing distance. Dougherty and Reed then attempted to take him off, and partially succeeded. He kicked Dougherty in the belly. He was then taken to the Mayor's Office. Passing through the hall, he tried to open the knife which the jury had before them, but Dougherty knocked it out of his hands. Hague took it from the man in the white coat who picked it up, before he had time to put it in his pocket. Jewell admitted to Laverty, without being asked, that he had cut a man in Leopold Sahl's tavern, who had thrown a tumbler at him. The barkeeper at Sahl's tavern swore that there had been no fight in the house during that day. Then who was cut? It was proven yesterday that there was blood on the point of the knife. Whose blood was it? If that was not the blood of Mitchell, whose was it?

There were three kinds of testimony—positive and direct, circumstantial, and admissions—Neither one of these, alone, was given in this case, but all three—if the jury believed the witnesses.

The learned Judge then proceeded to point out the different tests of malice, and to examine the defence set up, viz: motive, insanity, drunkenness. He then explained murder in the first and second degree, and manslaughter, and gave a number of instances of each.

In regard to insanity, if the proof was made out clear to the jury that the prisoner was insane, they would acquit him. They would not find him guilty of an inferior grade of crime.—Drunkenness has only an ameliorating circumstance, when the will was entirely taken away. His Honor made copious extracts from legal works on this point. It was no unusual thing, he said, though he did not apply his remarks to the prisoner at the bar, for persons who had determined to commit a crime, to make themselves drunk, and in that condition commit it, in order to avail themselves of the plea of drunkenness.

The learned Judge believed that he had fulfilled his duty as well as he knew how. The jury were the judges of the evidence, but they would apply the law as he laid it down. If the evidence was sufficient to make out a clear case of murder in the first degree, then they should return a verdict of murder in the first degree. Did Jewell intend to take the life of Mitchell? If so, then they should return a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree. Did he not intend to take life, but did so accidentally? Then it was murder in the second degree. But when a savage knife is thrust into a person, and inflicts a wound five inches deep, and two inches long, and the person stabbed dies in a few moments, the jury would judge whether it was the intention to kill, or only to make a scratch. They would judge the intention by the act. Was the act willfull, deliberate, premeditated? There was no pretence of accident set up by defence; therefore it was willful, deliberate, premeditated—What was "premeditated?" Was there any intention of killing, when the blow was struck? If so, then it was premeditated. If a man walks up to another, whom he has never seen before, and with a club, pistol, bowie-knife or axe, slays him without a word—that would be a deliberate, premeditated murder, nothing else. All that human nature could judge of human action, showed that he intended to do what he did. If not, he will prove it.

The Judge had ever discharged his duty, though it had been done in a feeble imperfect manner. The jury would remember, 1st. There was not a jot or tittle of evidence going to prove insanity in the prisoner. If there was, they would find him not guilty.

2nd. Ira mesnesse. They had heard all the testimony. Was the prisoner sufficiently intoxicated to be incapable of forming a design—not "mere drunk?" The Judge charged the Jury, that if Jewell was drunk when the blow was given, it would make no difference, said they would judge him as if he had been sober.

The business of the jury would now commence; himself been discharged. They were the judges of the evidence, and of the credibility of the witnesses. Whatever their verdict might be, they should specify the crime. He left the evidence with them. His words, except such as were unsupported by law, would be of but little account. However discerning or metaphysicly it was to commune it—although they would not be bound by it, as they were the judges—he would consider it his duty to say, reluctant and distressed as he felt, as a man, for the relatives of the prisoner, if they believed the testimony to be true, taking the whole of it, the unfortunate man would be found guilty of an unprovoked, dastardly, and cowardly murder in the first degree.

Judge Shaler, at the conclusion of Judge McClure's charge, requested that his Honor would charge the jury that any reasonable doubts they might entertain of the prisoner's guilt, should be thrown in his favor. Judge M'Clure charged the jury as requested.

Hon. C. Darragh remarked that he thought it was unusual to express so strong an opinion as the learned Judge had done, in a Criminal Court.

Judge M'Clure said that he had given no opinion. He had said what had been said a hundred times before, that if such a class of facts be true, then murder in the first degree would be the verdict;—the jury were the judges. His honor made some quotations, fully sustaining his ground.

The jury then retired.

JEWELL CONVICTED.

After the jury had been out for about an hour, they came into Court with their verdict. The Court requested the audience to remove, and to be perfectly quiet. The jury were then polled, and rendered a verdict against the prisoner of "GUILTY OF MURDER IN THE FIRST DEGREE."

The prisoner appeared much affected, and evidently did not expect such a result.

MASONIC HALL—Kah-ge-ga gah-bowh; or, the Rev. George Copway, Chief of the Ojibways, will deliver his first Lecture, this evening in the above named Hall. It is to be hoped that our citizens will be sufficiently interested to crowd the Hall. Aside from the merit of the subject to be discussed, "The Religious Belief, Poetry, Manners, &c., of the Indians," the funds realized are for a charitable purpose, thus appealing to the curiosity and sympathy of our readers. The Chief will appear in his original dress, and besides his lecture, will sing a number of Indian Songs. This part of the entertainment will, doubtless, be exceedingly interesting. Don't forget, then, this evening.

THEATRE.—Mrs. Farren appears this evening as Lucretia Borgia, and as Marianne in Knowles's play of the Wife. She appears to great advantage in both these parts. Mrs. Farren plays the Duke.

MONETARY AND COMMERCIAL.

BUFFALO—The market is still firm with a very good supply of 8 cents to-day, and 2,000 barrels from the 15 ult. at Tonawanda. In this city and Cincinnati the market is somewhat checked in consequence of the difficulty of negotiating bills, the banks being unwilling to discount to any extent. In the state of things, business is reduced quite one half of what it was a few weeks since. The following letter and extract from the Cincinnati Gazette, and the "Life of Thurlow Weed," by the author of "Life of the Honorable William H. Seward," will show a parallel case:
