A CHEMICAL DISCOVERY.

A discovery has been made in Paris, which, if it proves to be what it is represented, will be of the highest importance to the human race. It is the discovery of a substance which will destroy all animal and vegetable matter, and indefinitely prolong the existence of dead bodies. Dogs are the subjects to which it has been applied, and the experiments have been made in the presence of the Academy of Sciences, and other scientific men. A dog is killed by prussic acid, and then thrown into a vessel containing the chemical substance, which is a liquid. In a few days the animal is entirely dissolved, and the liquid is then evaporated, leaving a white powder, which is the substance in question. This powder is then thrown into water, and a dog is restored to life, which lives for some time, and then dies a natural death. The dog thus restored to life is as healthy as ever, and has been known to live for years after the operation. The discoverer of this substance says that he can, by the use of it, preserve the body of a man for centuries, and that it will be of the greatest importance to science, as it will enable the student to examine the human frame for years after death. The discovery is said to be a most important one, and will be patented. The Academy of Sciences have appointed a committee to examine it, and report upon its merits.

Any person who owns property in the city, and does not insure it, is foolish. Any person who owns property in the city, and insures it in the Pittsburgh Insurance Company, is wise. Any person who owns property in the city, and insures it in the Pittsburgh Insurance Company, and advertises the fact in the Gazette, is very wise. Any person who owns property in the city, and insures it in the Pittsburgh Insurance Company, and advertises the fact in the Gazette, and has his property insured for one-half its value, is the wisest man in the world. Any person who owns property in the city, and does not insure it, and does not advertise the fact in the Gazette, is a fool.
