THE IVY.

A graceful ivy, fair and young,
Around a dear old ruin twined,
And closer still it crept and clung
When o'er it swept the angry wind.

And for a time the ruin old
Looked fresh in vest so soft and sheen,
But oh the heart of stone is cold,
So, haply, felt that ivy green.

Yet drooped it not. With love unchilled,
Round every corner queer 'twould cling,
And sportive twined as fancy willed—
The living, loving wayward thing!

Sad sighed the wind one wintry eve
All mournful round the tottering pile;
Some gentle spirit seemed to grieve
O'er love that even at death could smile.

But all unheeded passed that sigh,
And all unmarked the boding voice—
The ivy true, as fate drew nigh,
But fonder clasped its hapless choice.

While, sadder as the sad winds sighed,
And answering cadence rose and fell,
Deep sobbing through each portal wide
The dear old ruin's funeral knell.

Then reeled and sank each lofty tower,
That long erect in stately pride
Had mocked the raging tempest's power,
And time's destroying hand defied.

Now, buried 'neath the mouldering heap,
The poor fond ivy whelmed lies—
Be such my lot! I would not weep,
But die when all I cherish dies.
