to give to the character of a settled policy... which, though it has produced some works of unexampled importance, has been attended with an expenditure of capital...

to hold the same opinions, or entertain the same sentiments, as the majority of the nation... It is not a matter of course that the majority of the nation will be found to be in the right...

There is an important subject of a domestic nature, which, from its intrinsic importance, and the very interesting questions which it involves, cannot fail to attract the attention of the public...
