PITTSBURGH GAZETTE

We cannot resist the inclination, to give our readers the following very fine poem, from the pen of Longfellow, as we think, which we find in Putnam for September:

SUNKEN TREASURES.

When the wintry waves of life subside,
And the mother ocean sleeps in silver rest,
I see, outstretched beyond or storm or tide,
The treasures gathered in its rewdy breast.

There still they shine, through the treasonest past,
My golden hours, that never shall be more!
No force upheaves the deep shall cast
Them back—o, vain shall wish them to the shore!

I see them glowing, beautiful as when
Breathe they floated, o'ways of my tale!
The locks of love, whose sunny skein
Enwound my heart, now all my own, twice-twined!

The smiles, the gladness of my heart as well
Look up to me, as perfect as at dawn,
My golden pleasures heaped in the swell
To meet my touch, and is again withdrawn.

There lies the early triumphs, closely won,
The laurels, hidden by the silvery spray,
And still his visions, like a drowning sun,
Send, up receding splendors through the surge.

There well the recognitions, the quick thee,
Whereon the heart knows its kin, wherever met;
And there the parties, when the wishful eye
Curves each other as they look their last.

There lie the homage, rare, delicious eyes,
The rich rose-tinted valleys flooded with light divine,
The lingering murmurs of the chestnut leaves,
The hand that lay, the eyes that looked in mine.

There lies the hour of fear and rapture yet,
The rarified climax of the mortal's years,
There still the ruins of was December was
A naked marvel—I cannot see for tears!

There are they all; they do not fade or waste,
Lapped in the arms of the embalming briar;
No ! fair they were and fair they shine embraced—
Of a the largest, beauty more divine.

Then all, but stretch my hands in vain:
No deep can plummet reaches where they rest,
No cunning diver shall bescad the sands:
And bring a single jewel from its breast.
