[The learned Judge referred at length to another case before the Supreme Court in 1849, Galdwell vs. Moon's exrs. 1, Jones 58 involving the same point.]

These authorities abundantly show that Dinsmorv's goods and chattele were liable to be distrained for the taxes assessed upon the premises before he purchased and went into the possession. And there is nothing in the sect of 1848 to remove that liability. The lien there spoken of has exclusive relation to the land, and in no wise affects the right of the collector to distrain upon any personal property found thereon, without regard to the continuance or termination of the lien upon the land. The right to distrain for taxes assessed previous to the possession's being taken by the compant, as we have already reen, existed before the passess of the act creating the lies, and still exists independently of the act, which is only cumulative in its character, creating a lien, where none existed before, and thus furnishing additional security for the taxes charged on the land.
