PITTSBURGH CHEMICAL AND VARNISH WORKS
FINCH & CO.,

RESPECTFULLY inform Druggists and Makers in Varnishes generally that they have for some time been engaged in the preparation of all the former Copal and other VARNISHES, and are now prepared to supply their friends and the public generally with articles of the very best manufacture, and of the most material, and selected with the greatest care and attention, at reasonable terms.

FINCH & CO. intend to devote themselves to cultivating a first class trade, and have no doubt that their efforts, combined with severe economy. Their tariff of prices will be found equally low with any of the eastern manufacturers, being determined that to articles of first class merit none but of approved and tasty quality, they only ask a fair trial and a share of public favor.

For our fine Body VARNISH we would call particular attention, as we have spared no pains or expense in the preparation of the very best brand, being made exactly after the process of the first class English houses, by Mr. Thomas Douglass, who for many years was engaged in some of the most extensive establishments in England and Scotland.

Our Anti-Corrosive BLACK VARNISH we would particularly recommend to Founders, Boat Builders, and Manufacturers of iron generally, its peculiar qualities prevent oxydation entirely, and in a great degree adhesion to those using varnish for iron, and preserves it in asphaltum and other compounds.

All orders left at Messrs. JOHN IRWIN & SONS' Front street, will be punctually attended to.

BELTING

Patent Riveted and Stretched
LEATHER BELTING,
From the Manufactory of Hoit & Brothers,
NEW YORK.

TO the Belting of this manufacture has been awarded Medals and Diplomas from almost every Fair and Institute throughout the United States; the most recent being in the Fall of 1855. It is of superior quality, every branch of the business being conducted by experienced workmen, and the leather hides themselves are selected by themselves at their own receiving house, having come from cold and severe localities. They tan their own tannery, after the hollow and shoulders have been trimmed off, and sent to New York thoroughly soaked, and from the vats, curried immediately, wet and dry stretched on machines of their own invention, and then cemented and riveted with their patent copper rivets, and there which make a perfectly even surface—on both sides of the belt, and which cannot be drawn out, thus saving a large amount of power more than 20 per cent, over those made in the ordinary manner. To mechanics of all kinds, to cotton and woolen manufacturers, rolling mills, paper makers, saw and sash and planing establishments, owners of grist mills, cotton gins, bleach works, ale houses, in short to every consumer, this Belting is specially recommended. We have on hand a large assortment of the quality of this Belting. For sale by M. DE LANGE, No. 233 Liberty st., opposite the head of Wood. my21

CHAPTER III.
A PATRIOT.

In the western part of the town, near where are now the corners of Greenwich and Liberty sts., at the time of which we write stood a small, dingy-looking cot, facing the river, before which was a high paling of cedar stakes, and behind which was a narrow garden, also inclosed by cedar pales. This cot was constructed by stout posts firmly driven into the ground and covered by old worn deck planks, which were held in their places by wooden pins. The two small windows in front had once been the storm-lights of some ship, while the two doors, one in front and the other in the rear, had evidently served their time in some cabin bulkhead. The roof, which was flat, with a slight descent rearward, was of framework, covered with old tarpaulins. The chimney had an advantage over most of the other chimneys of the town, for while they were of wood, this was of iron, having been the smoke-pipe of the old Half-Moon, which had come, through some round-about means, into the hands of its present possessor. Within the cot was comfortable, though it was far from tasty or neat. The only partitions between the various apartments were formed by suspending old sails from the framework of the roof, and these were so handily moved that the number of apartments, or the dimensions of any particular apartment could be increased or diminished with a quickness almost miraculous. Some half-dozen dirty hammocks were suspended from the cross-beams of the roof, while in one corner, and partially concealed by one of the aforementioned magic partitions, was a regular bed.

Close by the fireplace, which was built of a clayey mud burned down to a brick-like hardness, sat a woman engaged in frying some fish. She was not far from 50 years of age, but she still retained much of the voluptuous beauty of her youthful days, though evil passions had done much toward spoiling the form. She was a large woman and had a tendency towards corpulence. She sat this when the front door opened, and Casper Geldrop entered. The latter threw off his hat and sat down upon an old stool close by his wife, for such was the relation sustained by the woman of whom we have spoken.

"Well, Katrina," said the man, "I've found the people at last. I was after."

"Perhaps you remember one Peter Van der Veer. He was an East India merchant. He lived in Amsterdam—in a large house opposite the Hotel de Ville."

"Yes—I—I think I do," said Katrina, turning away her head, and trying to appear as though she were talking, but in fact endeavoring to hide an emotion which had come so suddenly upon her that she could not repress it.

"Well—he is the man I've been watching; and I have found out all I desired to know. He is stopping at the tavern. His wife is with him."

The woman did not yet dare to ask any questions, and ere long Casper spoke again:

"Were you aware that they had a son?"

Katrina fairly started at this question, but she knew that she must conquer her emotions, and with a powerful effort she did so.

"Of course they had a son," she said.

"I never knew it before. But how came you to know it, Katrina?"

"Why—I knew them many years ago in Fatherland, and I remember when their son was born."

"But I never heard you mention the family before."

"And I never heard you mention them, either."

"This retort seemed to disarm the man for that attack, and he turned upon another point.

"Katrina," he said, rather carefully, "do you think that you could ever carry revenge so far as to allow your enmity to fall upon the child for the sin of its parents?"

The wife turned suddenly pale, and a fearful tremor shook her frame.

"What do you mean?" she asked, trying with all her power to be calm.

"Why—I mean what I say. I hate Peter Van der Veer; and I hate his wife!"

Katrina breathed more freely, and ere long she had gained her wonted calmness. Yet she watched her husband's countenance narrowly, as though she would read his thoughts from what she could see there. But Casper had noticed the straggeness of her manner, and he wondered what it could mean.

"Look ye, Katrina—you seem to have some strange interest in this affair. What is it?"

"What is it? Why—nothing that I am aware of."

"O—but it must be something. Come—out with it."

A fortunate thought struck the wife at this juncture. She remembered to have heard, long years before, a few words which she had never forgotten, and which now came to her rescue.

"It was but a simple thing," she said, with a smile. "You once loved Theodora Van der Veer."

It was now the husband's turn to start, but he quickly smiled the emotion away, and then said:

"—you're jealous, eh! But never fear. If I did once love Theodora, it was before I knew you. But that love was changed to hate long ago, so have no fear on that account."

As Geldorp thus spoke some one knocked at the door, and upon opening it a stout Indian made his appearance. His dress betokened him to be a Sachem of the Raritans, and the feathers of his head-dress indicated that he was one of the chief warriors. His name was Kar-ge-wa-wa-gus; but he was better known among the Dutch as Red Shoe, from the color of the moccasins he wore. He entered the cot, and Katrina, in obedience to a hint from her husband, quitted the apartment.

"Now, Red Shoe," said Casper, "you have work to do. I have ascertained all I wish to know, and the person of whom I spoke is the one I thought. Upon him you can take the revenge you seek. We must have him out to-night. You will stick to your promise."

"Of course I will. The Raritan has sworn revenge," said Red Shoe, with a burning eye.—"Your money would not pay me for the work if we had not a deeper cause. A red man fell when he was minding his own business. He fell by the white man's bullet. We asked for justice, and it was refused. Our people will not rest satisfied until they can dip their hands in the white man's blood. Give me the victim, and our anger shall be appeased."

Casper Geldrop's eyes sparkled with satisfaction.

About a month previous to this time a Raritan had been murdered in cold blood near Pavonia. His brethren had asked that the murderer should be given up, but their request was denied, and they had sworn that they would have revenge. Geldrop knew this, and he now meant to take advantage of this circumstance for his own revengeful purpose.

"Be at the Western corner of the Company's first farm half an hour after sunset, with five of your people," said Geldrop. "I will meet you there, and you shall know what can be done to-night."

After this Katrina was called in, and having drank a measure of rum, the Indian went away. The wife seemed very uneasy, and several times she tried to find out what Red Shoe had been called for, but her husband would take no hint, and she dared not ask a direct question.

In the course of half an hour six men, all habited in the rough garb of seamen, entered the cot, and shortly afterwards supper was ready. It soon became evident, from the conversation of the party, that these new comers regarded Geldorp as their leader and master. They talked much about the "old sloop," and called Geldorp "Captain;" and once or twice they hinted at some operation which was not marked by any very just or virtuous character. It was very near sundown when the meal was finished, and having lighted their pipes they left the cot. In having lighted their pipes they left the cot. In Pipe and Ag
