got it, we do not hesitate to declare, that we do not hesitate to declare the careful property of the state. The first is: Do you think that, in the elections and nominations of officers, native Americans should be preferred? Mr. Wilmot answers: That preference has been always the rule in our country, and torsigned has been always the rule in our country, and torsigned has been always the rule in our country, and torsigned his Judgeship before challenging Packer, so that there was no reason whatever for allustone the candidater, which should always be well weighed; there may be occasions where such conscientious considerations will oblige us to vote for a foreign that the said question is meant in the same spirit, it certainly agree with that established policy.

Anybody must see, at the first glance, that Wilmot here says no more—or was he saked to say more—than we believe any native American, of wintever party, is accustomed to think the natural policy. The Democrata have always followed that rule as well as a series of the response to the think the natural policy. The Democrata have always followed that rule as well as a series of the response to the think the natural policy. The Democrata have always followed that rule as well as a series of the response to think the natural policy. The Democrata have always followed that rule as well as a series of the state.
