This is summary and plausible, and it is very it creates would be a fraud upon the innocent. This is summary and plausible, and it is very it creates that nothing better can be offered. It rests however upon an very imperfect notion as well of the doctrine of agency, as of natural it and political rights, and upon a gross misapprie-ie sension of the grounds upon which this power it has been defended. As a case of agency it could not have stood a moment. The doctrine of the Judges who favored the power, is that these are and the second depending on the assent of the people at all, and not therefore involving it any question of contract with them whatever. missioners. Then as to the money. The people have neither negotiated the honds or received or ex-pended a penny of the money, nor can it be even aid that it was expended within our midst. It was generally used abroad, in definee of all conditions; and in the case of the city was ex-pended entriely outside, except so for a sit masended entircly outside, except so far as it may ave found its way into the bands of resident flicers, attorneys and newspaper editors. How easily then is all this mist dispersed with f a very little light, and how absurd all this denunciation appear when we come fairly and squarely to the fact that assent or dissent were alike out of the question, and that ueither of them enter, either theoretically or practically, into the solution of the problem.
